Another instance: The president of one of the largest national banks of the city was waited upon at his bank and asked to sign the referendum petition. Being a prohibitionist and regarding the proposed referendum as an antiprohibition device, he refused. The caller, who was a depositor in the bank, immediately withdrew his account, amounting to $6,000, as a rebuke to the president. The next day, for the same reason, another depositor withdrew his account of $7,000. The board of directors, learning of the withdrawals, were, it is said, somewhat concerned. There was a meeting of the board, and while the matter was under discussion a gentleman called at the bank and asked for the president, who left the meeting to meet his visitor. The president was asked if it were true that he had refused to sign a petition for a referendum on prohibition for the District, giving as a reason that he favors prohibition for the District. The president said that he had refused to sign such petition for the reason given. The caller said he was glad to know it was true, and in order to show how glad he was he asked the privilege of opening an account at the bank, and thereupon made an initial deposit of $60,000.

PROPOSED REFERENDUM AMENDMENT A MERE MAKESHIFT.

If we are to have a referendum election, it is the duty of every Senator to see to it that the law referring this issue shall provide every safeguard that experience shows to be necessary to prevent corruption and secure an honest expression of the people's will. The liquor interests proper do not want this, but those who sincerely want the issue settled in this way and who are in favor of honest elections will surely unite in seeing that the best possible referendum law will be framed under which to hold such an election. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is a mere makeshift, not intended by him to be such, but that is, in my judgment, the effect of the amendment—hardly an outline of what should be in an election law, and does not manifest any desire to protect the people from the baneful influences of the traffic whose existence is at stake. If it were framed by the liquor people themselves it could not better serve their purpose. Let us take it up, section by section, and note briefly what it provides and what it does not provide:

Section 1: Only male taxpayers can sign the petition for an election.

Why have a referendum on a petition of taxpayers only? If taxpaying is to determine the qualifications of signers of petitions for a referendum, why not permit women taxpayers to sign? Their taxes are just the same as those of men. It is just as much a hardship on them to pay taxes as it is for the men and their qualifications to pay taxes must be the same. So, why restrict the signing of petitions to taxpayers or to male taxpayers? In all State referendums the petitioners are qualified voters. Why not so provide here? How are the commissioners to determine that the signers are duly qualified and that there is the required number? No way is provided for determining this. There is nothing to prevent fraudulent signatures and no way to determine whether the signatures are genuine or not. If an election is determined upon the petition, it must be held within 40 days from the date of the order for an election. Forty days is too short a time to prepare for such an election and to conduct a campaign upon such an issue. This time is not sufficient for dividing a city of 350,000 people into proper voting precincts, arranging for voting places, providing ballots, registering of voters, purging lists of those illegally registered, and all the election machinery necessary to conduct such an election. The commissioners, however, may fix the time as short as 20 days or 25 days. There should be no discretion left to the commissioners. The Congress should fix that, and for the first election the time should be much longer than 40 days.

Section 2: Only male residents over 21 years of age who have lived in the district and precinct more than a year prior to the date of holding election are to be permitted to vote.

How shall they establish their age? How establish the length of their residence? The bill provides no way whatever. No oath of any kind or at any time is required. No one is authorized to administer oaths in connection with registration or in connection with voting. No provision is made for disproving any assertion as to age or residence.

Under this provision every bum, boozer, pimp, gambler, and loafer of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York could be brought here and voted without fear of punishment—and they would be voted. The managers of the election are made the sole judges of the qualifications of the voters. This is unheard of in connection with elections of any character. It would make the election a farce. Disputes would soon arise over the qualifications of the voters, premeditated or otherwise. Votes could be rejected at will by the managers without fear of punishment. It should be needless to point out to the Members of this body the danger of placing such power as this in the hands of the managers. Provision is always made for challenging and swearing in votes, leaving the legality to be determined afterwards by a competent tribunal. There is no provision of this kind anywhere in the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Alabama. If the judges knew how a man would vote, they could reject him, and their decision could not be questioned. Hired challengers could easily be secured, and with subservient managers the will of any precinct can be thwarted without fear of punishment. Such loose legislation should not be considered for a minute.

Section 3: Notice of the election shall be given by publication for 20 days in some newspaper in the District.

Does this mean in a daily paper? It does not say. Must it be every day for 20 days? Would it permit publication in an obscure weekly newspaper over a period of 20 days, possibly some paper just established to serve that purpose? What shall the notice contain? No requirement in the law except that an election is to be held and describing the boundaries of the voting districts and voting places. Nothing is said of the hour of opening the polls or closing them or as to the question to be voted upon. No provision is made anywhere in the act determining the hours of voting. Most election laws provide for the closing of business, and especially of saloons, upon election days. Nothing in this proposed amendment does so. No provision insures the opening of polls at a time when thousands in the District can vote. This leaves an open door for corruption and intimidation without any means of punishing either. If an election of this importance is to be held, provision should be made so as to insure to the people of the District an opportunity to vote at a time outside of business hours, and the saloons should certainly be closed for some hours before the opening of the polls and until after the polls have closed.

Section 4: The commissioners are to appoint three managers, two clerks, and one returning official in each precinct, who shall, as nearly as practicable, be equally divided between those for and those against the proposition submitted. None of these officials are required to be qualified to vote or to reside in their precints. They may come from Baltimore, so far as any provision of the law is concerned.

Under this section the three managers could be against prohibition and the other three officers for it. With the three managers against it, it is very easy to see what the result would be upon challenges and upon any question involving the right of anyone to vote. If the managers are against the proposition and they think that the people of their precinct are for it, they could very easily reject any vote they see fit and could delay the voting without submitting themselves to any penalty. If any of those appointed by the commissioners fail to present themselves at the voting place, no provision is made for filling such vacancies. Could they be filled? If so, how? Could a man from Baltimore act? There is nothing to prevent this in the proposal of the Senator from Alabama.

Section 7: The commissioners are to deliver ballots, poll lists, tally sheets, return sheets, instructions for holding election, ballot boxes, voting booths, and so forth, to one of the managers of each precinct before the day of election.

How long before? No time is specified. Suppose the manager loses them, or some of them, how can they be supplied? There is no provision for such a contingency. Suppose the manager thinks his precinct is against his views, and he does not come to the polling place? There is no way to make him serve. There is no way to fill his place. There is no provision to compel him to turn over these things to some one else. It is not a fraud and not a corrupt act not to do so. Suppose he does not have a sufficient number of ballots for the voters, how is this deficiency to be supplied? Are those qualified to vote to be rejected because there are no ballots? For whose benefit are instructions for holding elections to be issued? Are the voters interested? Possibly so. Should they be advised of them? Surely so. But what good are these instructions if they are not to be brought to the attention of the voters before election day? What is to be done with them on election day to bring them to the attention of the voters? Are they to be posted? If so, where? There is no provision in the law relating to these instructions, except that they are to be handed to one of the managers. He may keep them or lose them—perhaps leave them at home—or do anything else with them he sees fit, so far as the proposed provisions go.

The commissioners are to appoint a registrar, or registrars, for each election precinct, who is to register the qualified voters. Where are they to come from? May they be political workers from New Jersey or ward heelers from the slums of Baltimore? Nothing in the law to prevent.

How is he to determine who the qualified voters are? The managers of the election are made the sole judges of the qualifications of voters. The registrars are not authorized to administer oaths. They can do no more than take a man's word as to his age and length of residence. When and where is he to register the voters? In the time, in the place, in the manner provided by the commissioners? Suppose the registration is not completed in the time given by the commissioners. There is no provision to care for such a situation as this. What notice is to be given of registration? None. If a man fails to register and has no notice of the time and place of registration, can the managers still permit him to vote? There is nothing to prevent them from doing so. As a matter of fact, they are made the sole judges of the qualifications of voters. If they decide for a man who is not registered, or who has not complied with any other possible provision of the law, that ends it and he can vote. The proposed amendment does not say that a man must be registered in order to vote. What is the purpose of the registration? None is disclosed by the proposal under consideration. The commissioners are authorized to make such rules and regulations as in their discretion they deem necessary for the management of and the fair and orderly conduct of the election. To whom are those rules and regulations to be issued? If to the voters, how are they to be made acquainted with them? If to the managers of the election, how are they to be enforced? The commissioners can not impose penalties. They have no legislative power. Suppose they issue no rules and regulations. They do not have to issue any under the proposed amendment.

Is it possible that any real friend of the referendum will have such a halting, defective, imperfect makeshift as this to ascertain the will of the people of the District of Columbia upon an issue of this character? I can not think so. Will any friend of the referendum who also believes in prohibition have any hope that the cause of either will be furthered by following such an invitation to fraud, vice, and corruption as this measure offers? Surely not.

LIQUOR INTERESTS OPPOSE REFERENDUM FAVORED BY TEMPERANCE PEOPLE.

All the liquor interests, not only of the District of Columbia, but of the United States, are opposed to prohibition in the District of Columbia, because they know that prohibition in the National Capital will accelerate the movement for prohibition all over the country. They are all for this referendum. They are for it, not because they believe in it, but for the same reason that they have opposed the referendum any time heretofore. They have always opposed a referendum on the liquor question when the temperence people were fighting for it. Never before have they anywhere asked for a referendum on the liquor question. The only time they have ever favored it has been for the next smaller unit of government when the temperance people have been asking for a referendum in the next larger unit of government.

The State of Ohio is one of the best examples, because we have seen the liquor forces in action there in opposing a referendum on saloons in every political unit. When the legislature passed the township local-option law, away back in 1888, the liquor people vigorously opposed the referendum. Later they opposed the referendum for the municipalities of Ohio. Two years after the passage of that law they opposed a referendum on this question in residential districts in the cities of Ohio, and four years later they vigorously opposed the enactment of county local option, which, of course, is a pure and simple referendum in the county unit. They have also opposed regularly the submission of the question of State-wide prohibition until, by the adoption of the initiative and referendum in Ohio's new constitution they became no longer able to successfully oppose a referendum through legislative procedure. They show their opposition to the referendum, however, wherever the people have the suffrage and the referendum is reasonable and proper. They championed and attempted to get the people to indorse what was called the stability amendment in Ohio last year, which, if adopted, would have tied the hands of the people, so that they could not again vote on any constitutional provision which had been submitted and twice failed to carry during the six years next following such vote. In other words, these devotees of the people's rule tried to get the people to deny themselves the right to amend their State constitution for six years, after two wet State victories, in order to safeguard the liquor traffic and prolong its life.

The liquor traffic is opposing a referendum now in various subdivisions of the State, ranging from municipalities up to the State itself, in every State with saloons in the Union. The only places where they are willing for a referendum is where the people have prohibited the liquor traffic and they want a chance to try to bring it back. They have opposed the referendum in Maryland and Indiana. They are opposing it to-day in New York. They opposed it in Virginia for years, and it was only two years ago that the legislature finally, after a long period of antisaloon agitation, passed the enabling act, which permitted the people to vote on the saloon question in Virginia in September, 1914, and under which the State voted dry. Among others, the States of Nebraska, South Dakota, and Montana are to vote on the question of prohibition during the present year, and the liquor traffic opposed the submission of the question to the people in each of these States. Minnesota passed a county local-option law last spring, but it was vigorously opposed by the combined saloon forces of the State until they were simply outnumbered and outgeneraled in the legislature. It is safe to say that the liquor traffic universally has opposed a referendum on this question to the people, and they are only in favor of it in Washington because it seems to be the most effective way to delay or defeat the insistent demand for prohibition in the Nation's Capital.

The National Hotel Gazette, of January 24 last, said:

If prohibition should be fastened upon the District by the Congress of the United States without even so much as an attempt to ascertain the will of the people constituting its citizenship, an unconscionable crime will be committed.

If it would be an unconscionable crime to refuse a referendum in the District of Columbia, where there is really no authority for it, why did the liquor interests oppose the referendum in these cases?

REFERENDUM IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

They are for the referendum now because they fear the Senate and Congress on a square vote on the issue will be against them and because of the conditions in the District, and through the avenues for fraud and corruption they hope to win in a referendum election. They also hope to win in the courts if they fail in the election. There is substantial basis for that hope, too. If they lose, if the vote is against them, they will go to the courts and contend that the referendum law is unconstitutional, as a delegation of legislative power by Congress.

Article I, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States provides:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives.

Article I, section 8, provides:

That Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States.

Exclusive legislative power could not be more clearly or definitely expressed. Congress is the sole governing body for the people of the District of Columbia. They have not the local sovereignty which is vested in the States, or enjoyed by local bodies under the jurisdiction of the States. All sovereignty and legislative power has been specifically delegated to Congress. Whether this plan was best and whether it should be continued is not a proper subject of controversy or discussion, in connection with this proposed referendum. Those who believe in local self-government for the District of Columbia can very properly ask for a change in the Constitution, but until the Constitution is changed no one who has a due regard for law and the Constitution can ask to make the District a distinctive sovereignty with legislative powers. There are no distinctive legislative units in the District of Columbia. Any legislation passed by Congress relating to the District of Columbia is and must be general, applicable to the entire District. This legislation for the District corresponds to general legislation passed by a legislature for the entire State.

A rule of law that is familiar to every lawyer is thus stated by Cooley in his "Constitutional Limitations," page 163, "Delegating Legislative Powers":

One of the settled maxims of law is, that the power conferred upon the legislature to make laws can not be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the State has located the authority, there it must remain; and by the constitutional agency alone the laws must be made until the Constitution itself is changed. The power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism this high prerogative has been instructed can not relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the power shall be devolved, nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confide this sovereign trust.

In many of the States the legislatures have referred to the people the question as to whether or not a proposed law shall go into effect. The courts have been called upon to pass upon the constitutionality of such measures where there was no provision in the constitution permitting it. There is a conflict of authority, but Cooley says, on page 168 of his Constitutional Limitations, seventh edition:

If the decision of these questions is to depend upon the weight of judicial authority up to the present time, it must be held that there is no power to refer the adoption or rejection of a general law to the people of the State any more than there is to refer it to any other authority. The prevailing doctrine in the courts appears to be that, except in those cases where by the constitution the people have expressly reserved to themselves a power of decision, the function of legislation can not be exercised by them even to the extent of accepting or rejecting a law which has been framed for their consideration. "The exercise of this power by the people in other cases is not expressly and in terms prohibited by the constitution, but it is forbidden by necessary and unavoidable implication. The senate and assembly are the only bodies of men clothed with the power of general legislation. They possess the entire power, with the exception above stated. The people reserve no part of it to themselves (with that exception), and can therefore exercise it in no other case." It is therefore held that the legislatures have no power to submit a proposed law to the people, nor have the people the power to bind each other by acting upon it. They voluntarily surrendered that power when they adopted the constitution. The government of the State is democratic, but it is a representative democracy, and in passing general laws the people act only through their representatives in the legislature.

Nor, it seems, can such legislation be sustained as legislation of a conditional character, whose force is to depend upon the happening of some future event or upon some future change of circumstances. "The event or change of circumstances on which a law may be made to take effect must be such as, in judgment of legislature, affects the question of expediency of the law; an event on which the expediency of the law, in the opinion of the lawmakers, depends. On this question of expediency the legislature must exercise its own judgment definitely and finally. When the law is made to take effect upon the happening of such an event, the legislature, in effect, declares the law inexpedient if the event should not happen, but expedient if it should happen. They appeal to no other man or men to judge for them in relation to its present or future expediency. They exercise that power themselves and then perform the duty which the Constitution imposes upon them." But it was held that in the case of the submission of a proposed free-school law to the people no such event or change of circumstances affecting the expediency of the law was expected to happen. The wisdom or expediency of the school act, abstractly considered, did not depend on the vote of the people. If it was unwise or inexpedient before that vote was taken, it was equally so afterwards. The event on which the act was to take effect was nothing else than the vote of the people on the identical question which the Constitution makes it a duty of the legislature itself to decide. The legislature has not power to make a statute dependent on such a contingency, because it would be confiding to others that legislative discretion which they are bound to exercise themselves and which they can not delegate or commit to any other man or men to be exercised.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. It has been my purpose to support the proposed submission of this question to a vote of the people of the District because of my belief in the general right of the people by a referendum vote to determine such matters for themselves; but the Senator is making a constitutional argument which impresses me very strongly and which up to this time seems to me to be unanswerable. However, I recall—and it is that about which I wish to question the Senator, since my memory may not be perfect concerning the matter—that at one time Congress by appropriate legislation conferred on the people of the District the power of self-government in certain matters; that is to say, by legislation they delegated to the people of the District the right to choose their own mayor or other governing official or officials. Assuming that that is true, I should like to ask the Senator whether, under the provision of the Constitution which gives Congress exclusive jurisdiction to legislate for the District, if Congress could delegate the right of self-government in regard to matters of a municipal character, it could not also delegate the right to vote upon a question of such importance as this one.

Mr. JONES. That is probably true. I do not think they could do it under our Constitution, although you will find in many cases the courts make really a distinction with reference to local matters.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I will yield in a moment to the Senator. As I look at it, the District of Columbia is just like a State. There are no different units in it, like we have counties and cities, and so on, in the States.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course the legislation to which I was referring was not referendum legislation.

Mr. JONES. I understand.

Mr. THOMAS. It was a delegation of the right of self-government under certain circumstances.

Mr. JONES. If the question had been raised I do not believe it would have been held to be constitutional. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I think it has been found necessary in all the States, so far as I know, to amend the constitution in order to permit a referendum vote.

Mr. THOMAS. That is undoubtedly true. But what is puzzling me as a legal proposition is the question whether, under the constitutional provision endowing Congress with exclusive jurisdiction to legislate for the District, it has the power to exercise some system of self-government, it being legal also to refer a matter of this kind to a vote of the people.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator remember that that was ever held by the Supreme Court to be legal?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know that the question was ever passed upon. I understand the legislation was repealed because it was found to be appropriate to govern the District directly.

Mr. WORKS. I have had some occasion to look into that of late, but I do not know that the question was ever submitted to the court. I know it was found to be unwise to attempt to legislate for the National Capital in that way; it turned out to be disastrous.

Mr. JONES. I have looked into the matter as carefully as possible, and I have been unable to find any decision or any case that went up on the proposition.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very confident from the Senator's discourse that he has made considerable and exhaustive examination. Hence, I applied to him for information.

Mr. JONES. I tried to find if there was any case in the District of Columbia.

Oberholtzer, on The Referendum in America, at page 217, says:

The unconstitutionality of laws of this character is a general principle so firmly established throughout the Union to-day that the legislature prefers not to run the risk of submitting its act to popular vote. In the case of prohibitory liquor laws and other legislative questions of a vexatious character it is a much more feasible plan, as I have noted on earlier pages, to embody the proposal in an amendment to the State constitution. With the liberalization of our ideas in regard to constitutional law, and the simplification of the process by which amendments may be submitted to popular vote, there is little reason now why the legislature should pursue a course that may bring down upon itself the charge of having misunderstood and violated the charter from which it derives its whole authority.

Willoughby, on The Constitution, volume 2, section 779, at page 234, says:

The weight of authority, however, seems to be that the submission to the electorate of the entire State as to whether a measure shall or shall not become a law is void.

I have here a list of States that have adopted a constiutional provision for a referendum and initiative, and I will read it:

South Dakota, Utah, Oregon, Nevada, Montana, Oklahoma, Maine, Missouri, Arkansas, Colorado, Arizona, California, Nebraska, Washington, Idaho, Ohio, Michigan, and North Dakota.

See also Ruling Law Cases, page 167:

A distinction is made between matters of general and local concern, and local and not general laws may be enacted subject to the approval of the voters of a particular section of the State.

We have, as I said before, no distinction in the District of Columbia between localities and the State. It is for all purposes a State in itself.

I give citations of some cases bearing upon this matter:

Santo v. State (Iowa), 1855–1863; American Decision, 502, 503; 160 Massachusetts (1894), 589–696; ex parte Wall. (Cal. 1874), 17 American Reports, 426–434; Lammart v. Lidwell (Mo., 1876), 21 American Reports, 412; State v. Hayes, 61 New Hampshire Reports (1881), 264–339.

In the last case is a full discussion of authorities, and the court came to the conclusion that while the principle of local government authorizes the granting of limited power of local legislation to municipalities, the power of State general legislation can not be delegated by the Senate and House of Representatives, where it is vested by the Constitution.

I wish to refer to one or two cases. I have quite a number here. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read them, but I wish to refer to one or two cases that take up this matter very fully.

I have here the Sixty-sixth Ohio State Reports, page 555. That is the beginning of the case. It is the case of Allison against Garver. The syllabus is as follows:

The act "to limit the compensation of county officers in Holmes County," passed April 26, 1898 (93 O. L., 660), is a law of a general nature which does not operate uniformly throughout the State, and it is therefore in violation of the constitution, article 2, section 26.

That article is the one stating that the legislative power of a State is vested in the senate and house of representatives:

State ex rel. Guilbert v. Yates, ante., 546, approved and followed.

2. An act of the general assembly not coming within the exceptions stated in the constitution, article 2, section 26, which is passed to take effect and be in force when a majority of the voters at an election shall declare in favor of a salary law, and if a majority of the voters do not so declare to be void, is passed to take effect upon the approval of authority other than the general assembly, and it is therefore unconstitutional and void.

At page 564 the court says:

This act is unconstitutional, also because it is conditioned to take effect only upon the result of an election by the people (constitution, art. 2, sec. 26, second clause).

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator the Ohio constitution?

Mr. JONES. I have not, but I examined the constitution. It is the general provision which says that the legislative power shall be vested in the legislature of the State.

Mr. NORRIS. Like the provision in the United States Constitution.

Mr. JONES. It is not near as strong, for the Senator will remember our Constitution says that exclusive legislation is vested in the Congress.

As I said, it is the general provision that is found in all constitutions that the legislative power shall be vested in a general assembly composed of the senate and house of representatives. That is the language of that section. I myself have examined it. Section 13 of the act provides:

Section 13 of the act provides for a vote upon the proposition, "For the county salary law; against the county salary law," and then provides that if a majority of the votes cast on said proposition shall be in favor of a salary law the act "shall take effect and be in force" from and after a day named; otherwise that the act should be void. The act can not take effect under the Revised Statutes, section 77, because it contains a provision as to the time when it shall take effect and be in force, if at all. Hence the taking effect, as well as the enforcement of the statute, is made to depend on the approval of another authority than the general assembly, namely, the will of a majority of the electors. The entire legislative power of the State is vested in the general assembly (constitution, art. 2, sec. 1), and even without the limitation contained in section 26, article 2, it could not be delegated.

Here is the statement of the court with reference to this section. They say:

It was held in Railroad Company v. Commissioners (1 Ohio St., 77, 87), which was a case under the constitution of 1802, that the power of the general assembly to pass laws could not be delegated by them to any other body or to the people; and this proposition is abundantly sustained by numerous authorities cited in the brief of the plaintiff in error.

Then the court discusses several Ohio cases that were cited by the other side of the controversy and distinguishes them from the case at bar.

I will put in that discussion without reading it if the Senate will permit me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota in the chair). Without objection, the matter will be inserted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The cases of State ex rel. v. Commissioners (5 Ohio Stat., 497), Noble et al. v. Commissioners (5 Ohio Stat., 524), Peck v. Weddell (17 Ohio Stat., 271), and Newton et al. v. Commissioners (26 Ohio Stat., 618) were all cases in which it was required by the constitution (art. 2, sec. 30), before the taking effect of the laws, that they should be submitted to the electors of the counties to be affected thereby and adopted by a majority of the electors voting at such election. In each of those cases the question was whether some other thing than the voting was necessary before the law could "take effect"; and the court held that the acts became law when adopted by a majority of the electors of the county, but that the legislative intention was that the law should not be enforced until the condition precedent should be performed. In Trustees v. Cherry et al. (8 Ohio Stat., 564) the court held that the vote which was required was a condition precedent to make an assessment to pay for the grounds which the trustees were authorized by the act to purchase. In Gordon v. State (46 Ohio Stat., 607) the act in question provided that it should take effect and be in force from and after its passage; but the question was whether the local-option provision contained in the act rendered it unconstitutional. The court held that the act "was a complete law when it had passed through the several stages of legislative enactment and derived none of its validity from the vote of the people. In all its parts it is an expression of the will of the legislative department of the State." Our conclusion is that there is nothing either in principle or the decisions of this court contravening the view which we have expressed concerning the effect of section 13 of the act (93 O. L., 660). It affects the whole act, and the act is as if it never had been passed.

Mr. JONES. Then I have a Massachusetts case. It is not exactly a case. It seems that in Massachusetts they had a provision under which the legislature could call upon the members of the court for an opinion with reference to the constitutionality of proposed legislation. The legislation was submitted under that provision. It is found in 160 Massachusetts in the supplement.

Mr. CLAPP. I will remind the Senator, while it is not technically germane, that even that provision has been held void in other States conferring authority to submit the question to the court.

Mr. JONES. This is the opinion of the justices to the house of representatives, at page 589. This was the question submitted: Is it constitutional to provide, in an act granting women the right to vote in town and city elections, that it shall take effect on approval by the people? That is the question which was submitted to the justices.

The constitutions of different States resemble one another in many of their principal provisions, and it generally has been held, whenever the subject has come before the courts, that the legislative power can not be delegated by the legislature to any other body or authority, and that the people themselves have not retained this power except where they have expressly provided for it.

It is true that a general law can be passed by the legislature to take effect upon the happening of a subsequent event. Whether this subsequent event can be the adoption of the law by a vote of the people has occasioned some differences of opinion, but the weight of authority is that a general law can not be made to take effect in this manner. Whether such legislation is submitted to the people as a proposal for a law, to be voted upon by them and to become a law if they approve it, or as a law to take effect if they vote to approve it, the substance of the transaction is that the legislative department declines to take the responsibility of passing the law; but the law has force, if at all, in consequence of the votes of the people; they ultimately are the legislators. It seems to us by the constitution the senate and the house of representatives have been made the legislation department of the government, and that there has not been reserved to the people any direct part in legislation. The various amendments made by the constitution since its adoption have not changed its character in this respect. By the second and ninth articles of amendments to the constitution, an act constituting a town or towns a city government can be passed only with the consent of the inhabitants of such town or towns, and specific amendments to the constitution proposed by the general court must be sumbitted to the qualified voters of the Commonwealth. A city charter resembles a State constitution in this, that the government of the town is made by the charter a representative government, and it was originally declared that the people alone have a right to institute government and to change it. Declaration of Rights, article 7. These amendments, as well as the other amendments to the constitution, indicate no intention of having laws submitted to the people for adoption or rejection.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the first question should be answered in the negative.

This is signed by Walbridge A. Field, Charles Allen, James M. Morton, and John Lathrop. Then there is a dissenting opinion signed by Oliver Wendell Holmes, jr., and then another opinion quoted, which I want to put in my remarks, at page 596, to the same effect as the others I have read, signed by Marcus P. Knowlton.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be inserted, without objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In adopting the constitution the people of the Commonwealth established a representative government consisting of three departments, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. In these all the power originally residing in the people was vested and through them all the functions of the government are to be performed. The framers of the constitution did not seek to establish a pure democracy, but they preferred a system in which all power should be vested in officers chosen by the people. The execution of the laws is intrusted to the governor and his associates in his department, the enactment of laws to the legislature, subject qualifiedly to the approval of the governor, and the interpretation of the laws to the justices appointed for that purpose. The members of each of these departments of the government are charged with the duty of doing that which belongs to their department. They can not delegate their official power to others. The governor is not a mere agent of the people who can refuse to assume the responsibility of action in matters within his department and put upon the electors as his principals the duty of deciding for him whether his actions shall be of one kind or another. He is for time the repository of all the power of the people in those matters which belong to his office. He must do his official duty, and there is no way in which he can shift the burden of the executive business from his shoulders to those of the people of the Commonwealth. If an application for the pardon of a criminal is made to him he can not relieve himself of responsibility by entering an order that the pardon shall be granted if the people of the State, at a meeting called for the purpose, vote in favor of it.

A judge who under the constitution derives all his power from the people can not refer back to the people the cases which he is called upon to decide. He can not enter a decree that this case shall be decided for the plaintiff, or this law shall be declared unconstitutional if a majority of the people so decide upon the submission of the question to them at their next election. The sole power to grant pardons is in the governor, and the sole power to decide judicial controversies is in the judges. By the bestowal of this power in the adoption of their constitution the people were divested of that which was bestowed, and it can be restored to them by nobody so long as the constitution remains unchanged.

Nor was it any more contemplated by the framers of the constitution that the department of the government which is charged with the duty of enacting laws should fail to do its whole duty, and should merely propose to the people laws which shall or shall not take effect as the people vote. The legislature is the law-making body. The people's representatives acting together after due deliberation, are to complete the work of making such laws as seem to them good. The people deliberately put away from themselves into the hands of this body all authority touching this subject, and until there is a change of the constitution neither they nor the legislature can put it or any part of it back. Their supreme power may find full exercise from time to time in choosing those who represent them, and in amending the constitution or adopting a new one. Under our frame of government, to call in the people to vote directly upon the enactment of a law is, in my opinion, as much an attempt to delegate legislative power as the submission of such a question to any other tribunal.

The reasons which induced our forefathers to adopt such a system might be considered at great length, but we are not now so much concerned with the reasons for their action as with the nature and effect of it. The important fact is that their scheme of government was intended to cover the whole field, and it leaves no place for the people in the enactment of laws, except as they speak through their representatives.

In the interpretation of similar constitutions in other States there is a great weight of judicial authority in favor of this view. Decisions in accordance with it have been made by the courts of last resort in New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, California, and Texas.

Mr. JONES. Then I have a case from the State of Iowa—Santo against State, found at page 497 in Sixty-third American Decisions. This case was on a local-option proposal. I desire to read a brief paragraph at page 502:

We will first consider the question relating to the submission of an act to a vote of the people; and on this subject we entertain no doubts. The general assembly can not legally submit to the people the proposition whether an act should become a law or not, and the people have no power, in their primary or individual capacity, to make laws. They do this by representatives. There is no doubt of the authority of the legislature to pass an act to take effect upon a contingency. But what is a contingency in this sense and connection? It is some event independent of the will of the law-making power, as exercised in making the law, or some event over which the legislature has not control.

For instance, the embargo laws and their cessation were made to depend upon the action of foreign powers in relation to certain decrees. The will of the lawmaker is not a contingency in relation to himself. It may be such in relation to another and external power, but to call it so in relation to himself is an abuse of language. Now, if the people are to say whether or not an act shall become a law, they become, or are put in the place of, the lawmaker. And here is the constitutional objection. Their will is not a contingency upon which certain things are or are not to be done under the law, but it becomes the determining power whether such shall be the law or not.

It seems to me there is no way of getting around the logic there presented. The law that is proposed here will not be a law unless the people approve it. The people make it; Congress does not make it, and it is not proposed that Congress shall make it. The opinion proceeds:

This makes them the "legislative authority," which, by the Constitution, is vested in the Senate and House of Representatives and not in the people.

I ask leave to continue the quotation, pages 502 to 505, which I have marked, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

It can not be considered necessary to argue concerning the submission of acts of incorporation to the acceptance of the corporators. These are private matters, and not a part of the public law of the land. It is a question of private interest only whether certain persons shall become a corporation; and, in the case of a strictly private one, probably the legislature could not make them such against their assent. And in the case of municipal corporations, they are, in the legal sense, private; and so they are in a common sense, to all practical intents.

It is a question for the local community alone to determine whether they will be incorporated or whether they will be so as a town or city. This distinction is made practically, always and everywhere, whether it be founded in strict logic or not. The constitution prescribes the manner in which bills shall become laws, and acts or laws can be enacted in no other way. A certain body or department is created for this purpose, and no other has the smallest authority in that respect. Article 3 of the constitution is, in part, as follows: "The powers of the government of Iowa shall be divided into three separate departments—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. The legislative authority of this State shall be vested in a senate and a house of representatives, which shall be designated the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, and the style of their laws shall be: 'Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa.'" How is a law enacted? Section 16 of the same article directs that "bills may originate in either house, except," etc.; and "every bill, having passed both houses, shall be signed by the speaker and president of their respective houses." And section 17 provides that "every bill which shall have passed the general assembly shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the governor. If he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections," etc. Then follow directions as to how it shall become a law, notwithstanding the governor's objections. It will be observed that there are under the constitution but three departments of the government; that the legislative department consists of the senate and house of representatives, and the people do not constitute a portion of it; and that laws are enacted "by the general assembly." This is the mode provided by the constitution for making laws. A bill becomes an act or a law in the above manner or it never becomes such. A vote of the people can not make it become a law, nor can it prevent it becoming one. After a bill has thus passed the two houses and received the approval of the governor, and thus becomes a law by the constitution, how can a vote of the people affect it? As well might this court submit the decision of these causes to a vote of the people of the State, or of a judicial district, or the governor his pardoning power. If there is any efficacy in a vote of the people in passing a law, then, of course, it can be repealed only by a vote.

What effect, then, had the vote of the people? None at all, in a legal sense or manner. The constitution made it an act of the general assembly when it had passed the two houses and received the proper signatures. But it is argued that the eighteenth section, submitting the act to a vote, is part of the act, and so becomes a law with the rest. The answer to this is that if the general assembly has no authority to submit such a question, then such a provision is void, and it will follow that either the whole act or the section containing the objectionable matter is null and void. The following are authorities on both sides of the question of submitting acts to a vote of the people, the following hold it constitutional: State of Vermont v. Parker (26 Vt., 357); Johnson v. Rich (9 Barb., 680). The following hold it unconstitutional: Thorne v. Cramer (15 Id., 112); Bradley v. Baxter (Id., 122; S. C., 1 Am. Law Reg., 658); Barto v. Himrod (8 N. Y., 483; 59 Am. Dec., 506); Rice v. Foster (4 Harr. (Del.), 479); People v. Collins (3 Mich., 343; S. C., 2 Am. Law Reg., 591); Commonwealth v. McWilliams (11 Pa. St., 61); Parker v. Commonwealth (6 Id., 507; 47 Am. Dec., 480).

This leads us to the next step, which is, whether the whole act, or the the eighteenth section only, is invalid. It is assumed, for the present, that the matter was submitted to the people in the largest and broadest sense. This is unconstitutional and void. But an act void in part is not necessarily void for the whole. If sufficient remains to effect its object, without the aid of the invalid portion, the latter only shall be rejected, and the former shall stand. This doctrine is clearly maintained in the Massachusetts cases: Fisher v. McGirr, and other cases (1 Gray, 1; 61 Am. Dec., 381); Campbell v. Mississippi Union Bank (6 How. (Miss.), 625); State v. Cox (8 Ark., 436); Commonwealth v. Kimball (24 Pick., 361; 35 Am. Dec., 326); Norris v. Boston (4 Met., 288); Clark v. Ellis (2 Blackf., 10). Now, the prohibitory act of Iowa is a complete act in all its parts, without the eighteenth section submitting it to the people. No part depends for its efficacy or practicability on that section. It can be carried into effect as well without it as with it. That section relates to nothing but the vote, the returns, publication of the result, and like matters. Testing this act, then, by the same rules which are applied to others, we see no reason why the whole act should be declared unconstitutional and void. It was not the vote of the people which was unconstitutional, but it was the submission to the people; and that part of the act was and is invalid if it submitted the question whether it should be the law or not; and the vote was to a legal intent nugatory. It effected nothing. The act would have been law had the vote been against it. Why the courts of some States have held an act submitted to the people to be void rather than the mere act of submission, as in the case of the New York school law, does not clearly appear. Under our constitution and laws there seems to be no difficulty, as will be shown in the next step of our inquiry.

Mr. JONES. I have one more decision here I will call attention to, because it is comparatively recent. This is the case of Wright against Cunningham, in One hundred and fifteenth Tennessee, at page 445, and this was a liquor statute. At page 458 the court says:

The act may provide upon its face that this duty of compliance may depend upon the happening of a condition or contingency. It has been so held in this State (State v. T. C. I. & R. R. Co., 16 Lea, 136); and this rule is general.

The controversy in the authorities arises over the nature of the condition or contingency, specifically whether a favorable vote of the people may be made the condition. On the one hand, it is said that the event must be such as, in the judgment of the legislature, affect the question of the expediency of the law, and that upon this question the legislature must exercise its own judgment definitely and finally, and can appeal to no other man or men to judge for them.

It cites several cases and then quotes a dissenting opinion following the contrary view in different cases, which I will put in the RECORD with my remarks but will not take the time of the Senate to read now.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Per Ruggles, C. J., in Barto v. Himrod (8 N. Y., 483; 59 Am. Dec., 506; Cooley, Const. Lim. (7th ed.), 169). The point was thus put by Reed, J., in his dissenting opinion in Paul v. Gloucester Co. Circuit Judge (50 N. J. Law, 585; 15 Atl., 272; 1 L. R. A., 86): "The difference between the statutes based upon a valid contingency and those based upon a contingency void as a delegation of legislative power may, I think, be clearly stated. The first is a statute ordaining a fixed rule of civil conduct applying to a certain prescribed condition of fact which may arise in futuro. The last is a statute which leaves to the people the power to say whether, when such a rule has been enacted, it shall ever become operative. One leaves the rule a law ready to operate upon the subject matter whenever it arises. The other leaves it to another to say whether the rule shall ever become a law." (15 Atl., 286; 1 L. R. A., 96.) The opposite view is thus stated by Redfield, C. J., in State v. Parker (26 Vt., 357): "If the operation of a law may fairly be made to depend upon a future contingency, then, in my apprehension, it makes no essential difference what is the nature of the contingency, so it be an equal and fair one, a moral and legal one, not opposed to sound policy, and so far connected with the object and purpose of the statute as not to be a mere idle and arbitrary one. * * * It seems to me that the distinction attempted between the contingency of a popular vote and other future contingencies is without all just foundation in sound policy or sound reasoning, and that it has too often been made more from necessity than choice, rather to escape from an overwhelming analogy than from any obvious difference in principle in the two classes of cases; for * * * one may find any number of cases in the legislation of Congress where statutes have been made dependent upon the shifting character of the revenue laws, or the navigation laws, or commercial rules, edicts, or restrictions of other countries. In same, perhaps, those laws are made by representative bodies, or it may be by the people of these States, and in others by the lords of the treasury or the boards of trade, or by the proclamation of the sovereign; and in all these cases no question can be made of the perfect legality of our acts of Congress being made dependent upon such contingencies. It is, in fact, the only possible mode of meeting them, unless Congress is kept constantly in session. The same is true of acts of Congress by which power is vested in the President to levy troops and draw money from the Public Treasury upon the contingency of a declaration or act of war committed by some foreign State, Kingdom, Empire, prince, or potentate." In Smith v. Janesville (26 Wis., 291), Dixon, C. J., states the matter as follows: "But if is said that the act is void, or at least so much of it as pertains to the taxation of shares in national banks, because it was submitted to a vote of the people, or provided that it should take effect only after approval by a majority of the electors voting on the subject at the next general election. This was no more than providing that the act should take effect on the happening of a certain future contingency, that contingency being a popular vote in its favor. No one doubts the general power of the legislature to make such regulations and conditions as it pleases with regard to the taking effect or operation of laws. They may be absolute or conditional and contingent; and if the latter, they may take effect on the happening of any event which is future and uncertain. Instances of this kind of legislation are not infrequent. The law of Congress suspending the writ of habeas corpus during the late rebellion is one, and several others are referred to in the case In re Richard Oliver (17 Wis., 681). It being conceded that the legislature possesses this general power, the only question here would seem to be whether a vote of the people in favor of a law is to be excluded from the number of those future contingent events upon which it may be provided that it shall take effect. A similar question was before this court in a late case (State ex rel. Attorney General v. O'Neill, Mayor, etc., 24 Wis., 149) and was very elaborately discussed. We came unanimously to the conclusion in that case that a provision for a vote of the electors of the city of Milwaukee in favor of an act of the legislature before it should take effect was a lawful contingency, and that the act was valid. That was a law affecting the people of Milwaukee particularly, while this was one affecting the people of the whole State. There the law was submitted to the voters of that city, and here it was submitted to those of the State at large. What was the difference between the two cases? It is manifest, on principle, that there can not be any."

It is perceived that the illustration given by Redfield, C. J., falls directly within the description of the admissible contingencies referred to by Ruggles, C. J., and Reed, J., which may be selected in advance by the legislature as determining the expediency of putting into operation the provisions of a given law, without recourse to the decision of the people of the State or country who are to be affected by that law, and whereby a vote may make the law operative or not, according to their own views of policy or expediency, without regard to the grounds on which the legislators acted in passing or proposing the law; in the former class of cases the act becoming a law and becoming operative by virtue of the authority of the legislature itself, and in the latter being reduced to a mere proposition to the electorate of a State, and becoming operative as a law by virtue only of the action of such electorate. It is also perceived that Dixon, C. J., offers the same class of illustrations and one other, the last being the case of a town or city voting to accept or reject a law provided by the legislature for a specified locality in a State, a municipal corporation of the State, a point to which we shall return later.

We incline to the views expressed by Ruggles, C. J., and Reed, J.

Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, while expressing his personal opinion that the rule championed by Redfield, C. J., and Dixon, C. J., is the sounder one, yet concedes in his text that the opposite view has the weight of judicial opinion in its favor, so far as concerns general laws applicable to a whole State. (Id., 7th ed., pp. 168, 169.) See to the same effect the discussion contained in the Opinion of the Judges in re Municipal Suffrage to Women (160 Mass., 586; 36 N. E., 488; 23 L. R. A., 113), and State ex rel. v. Forkner (94 Iowa, 1; 62 N. W., 772; 28 L. R. A., 206); Ex parte Wall (48 Cal., 279; 17 Am. Rep., 425); Morford v. Unger (8 Iowa, 82); Santo v. State (2 Iowa, 165; 63 Am. Dec., 487); State v. Beneke (9 Iowa, 203); State v. Wilcox (45 Mo., 458); Gibson v. Mason (5 Nev., 283); State v. Hayes (61 N. H., 264); Thorne v. Cramer (15 Barb. (N. Y.), 112); Barto v. Himrod (supra); People v. Stout (23 Barb. (N. Y.), 349); Parker v. Com. (6 Pa., 507; 47 Am. Dec., 480); Cin., etc., Ry. Co. v. Clinton (1 Ohio St., 77); People v. Collins (3 Mich., 343).

But the great majority of the cases seem to favor the constitutionality of what are termed "local-option laws," under which the people of a county, city, or town are permitted to decide by a popular vote whether a given statute, providing police regulations in respect of the sale of intoxicating liquors, the running of live stock at large, etc., shall be operative in such county, city, or town. (Cooley, Const. Lim., 7th ed., 172–174; 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 2d ed., pp. 488–496.)

We have read and considered such of the cases cited as are accessible to us, and in the discussions contained in the majority and minority opinions appearing in these cases we have had the benefit of many other authorities not directly accessible, and we have attentively considered the grounds on which the numerical weight of authority is rested. It would be a useless consumption of time to attempt a discussion of these cases—indeed, an impossible task within the limits of a judicial opinion.

Suffice it to say that questions of State constitutional law are, in a very important sense, peculiarly local, and in every jurisdiction the court of last resort must decide for itself the meaning of the constitution under which it exists and the validity of laws enacted by the legislative branch of the government. The decisions of other courts construing constitutions containing similar provisions can be, at most, only suggestive and advisory.

Upon the subject of a popular vote to determine whether a legislative act shall be effective within a given subdivision of the State, our constitution contains the following provisions:

By article 2, section 29, it is provided that: "The general assembly shall have power to authorize the several counties and incorporated towns in this State to impose taxes for county and corporation purposes, respectively, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law. * * * But the credit of no county, city, or town shall be given or loaned to or in aid of any person, company, association, or corporation, except upon an election to be first held by the qualified voters of such county, city, or town, and the assent of three-fourths of the votes cast at said election. Nor shall any county, city, or town become a stockholder with others in any company, association, or corporation, except upon a like election and the assent of a like majority."

By article 10, section 2, it is provided: "No part of a county shall be taken off to form a new county, or a part thereof, without the consent of two-thirds of the qualified voters in such part taken off; and where an old county is reduced for the purpose of forming a new one, the seat of justice in said old county shall not be removed without the concurrence of two-thirds of both branches of the legislature, nor shall the seat of justice of any county be removed without the concurrence of two-thirds of the qualified voters of the county."

By article 2, section 1, it was provided that: "The powers of the government shall be divided into three distinct departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial."

By section 2 it was provided that: "No person or persons belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any of the powers properly belonging to either of the others, except in the cases herein directed and permitted."

PEOPLE THROUGH LEGISLATURES ONLY WAY TO AMEND CONSTITUTION.

Mr. JONES. The only power reserved in our National Constitution is the power of the people to vote upon amendments. That, even, is not reserved to the people of the District of Columbia in our National Constitution. The only power that can amend the Constitution of the United States is that of the people of the different States of the Union acting through their legislatures, or it may be submitted through conventions. The court says:

The only power of legislation which was reserved to the people at large was the power to vote upon amendments to the constitution. (Art. 11, sec. 3.) For the rest they were content to reserve to themselves the power of electing their officers for limited terms, and to reserve the various fundamental rights embraced in the Bill of Rights, only one of which latter, that embraced in section 23, bears upon legislation. That section declares "that the citizens have a right, in a peaceable manner, to assemble together for the common good, to instruct their representatives, and to apply to those invested with the powers of government for redress of grievances, or other purposes, by address or remonstrance."

It is a well-recognized principle that the legislature of a State has all powers of legislation, except in so far as it may be restrained by the constitution of the State or of the United States, expressly or by necessary implication. (Redistricting Cases, 111 Tenn., 234, 291, 292, 80, S. W., 750.)

There is another principle which should be recalled at this stage of the discussion, viz: That legislative power can not be delegated except in those special instances in which the Constitution itself authorizes such delegation or those sanctioned by immemorial usage originating anterior to the constitution and continuing unquestioned thereunder.

And all the cases that apparently held that the legislative power can be delegated are as a matter of fact based upon that principle of the law as declared by this court:

The immemorial usage referred to has found its expression in only two forms: Firstly, in the powers conferred upon municipal corporations in their several charters, and by general statutes applying to such corporations and pertaining to the ordering and administration of their local affairs; secondly, in the powers conferred upon the quarterly county courts of the several counties of the State for the management of local matters. It is said in our cases that the counties of the State are municipal corporations of a noncomplex character; that the county courts constitute the governing body of these corporations; that these courts have judicial and police powers; that "they can exercise that portion of the sovereignty of the State communicated to them by the legislature and no more"; and that "in the exercise of the powers so conferred they become miniature legislatures, and the powers so exercised by them, whether they are called municipal or police, are in fact legislative powers." (Grant v. Lindsay, 11 Heisk., 666; Maury Co. v. Lewis Co., 1 Swan, 236, 240; Redistricting Cases, 111 Tenn., 253–257, 80 S. W., 750.) The origin of the power to delegate legislative functions to the counties is not only to be found in ancient usage, but also may be traced to the direct language of the Constitution, which provides, in Article XI, section 9, that "the legislature shall have the right to vest such powers in the courts of justice, with regard to private and local affairs, as may be expedient."

But in delegating the powers mentioned to municipal corporations proper, or to counties, the legislature has always under our system dealt with the governing bodies of these organizations as the representatives of the constituent people and not directly with the people themselves. Nor is the principle impaired by the force of the well-recognized rule that the acceptance, rejection, or surrender of municipal charters may be left by legislative act to the vote of the people embraced in an existent or proposed municipality (Cooley Const. Lim., 7th ed., 165, 166; Brinkley v. State, 108 Tenn., 475, 67 S. W., 796), any more than by the fact that general charters may be framed for the creation of private corporations which may never become actually operative until adopted by the requisite number of persons organizing under them, and which may subsequently be surrendered by the same persons or their successors.

We see no difference in principle between making the operative efficacy of an act of the legislative dependent upon the contingency of a favorable vote of the whole constituency of the State (which we have seen can not be done) and making the efficacy of an act dependent upon the favorable vote of a single county, and there is none. Such difference can not be found in the fact, as many cases in other jurisdictions hold, that the powers conferred upon such subordinate divisions of the State are police powers. The nature of the powers conferred may have, and no doubt does have, a controlling influence in determining whether they shall be delegated at all, but can have no influence in fixing the method under which they shall be devolved. Whether a legislative act embrace police powers or other powers, rights, or duties, at last it is but a legislative act, and to be valid must square with the Constitution in all respects. All legislative acts, regardless of their contents or of their relative importance, must pass the same ordeal, not one, from a constitutional standpoint, being entitled to more consideration, or subjected to more stringent limitations, or to be treated with more leniency than any other. All must be measured with the same measure.

On these grounds we are of the opinion that, under our Constitution, no legislative act can be so framed as that it must derive its efficacy from a popular vote. To be valid it must leave the hands of the legislature complete; not in the sense that it must go into effect at once, it is true, but it must at its birth bear the impress of sovereignty and speak the sovereign will. If it contain within itself a condition or a contingency suspending to some future time, or to the happening of some future event, its obligatory force as a rule of action or conduct of the people for whom it was intended, that contingency or that event must be one selected by the sovereign power itself as one the happening of which shall render it immediately expedient that the suspension of the power inherent in the act shall cease, and that it shall at once become operative as a rule of conduct for the government of the people. Obviously, if the contingency selected be the favorable vote of the people who are to be governed by the law, it is that vote which makes the statute efficacious as a law and not the antecedent will of the legislature, the constitutional lawmaking power. It is said in some of the cases that the vote is the effect of the law, and not the law the effect of the vote; but we think this is a mere play on words, since it is clear that, if all laws were made dependent upon such a contingency, representative constitutional government would be destroyed.

It is the purpose of our institutions, so far as they concern legislative bodies, that the popular will should find expression in the laws enacted by such bodies. This is to be accomplished, however, under the Constitution, by sending representatives to those bodies whose views upon public questions are known and whose faithfulness is approved, and by petition and by instructions formulated in popular assemblies and forwarded to the lawmaking power, and by retiring from public life those who fail to truly represent their constituents, and by sending in their stead others who will supply what has been left undone and correct what has been wrongfully done.

In Seventeenth American Reports is found the decision in the case of Ex parte Wall, Forty-eighth California, page 279, from which I quote the following:

But it does not follow that a statute may be made to take effect upon the happening of any subsequent event which may be named in it. The event must be one which shall produce such a change of circumstances as that the lawmakers, in the exercise of their own judgment, can declare it to be wise and expedient that the law shall take effect when the event shall occur. The legislature can not transfer to others the responsibility of deciding what legislation is expedient and proper, with reference either to present conditions or future contingencies. To say that the legislators may deem a law to be expedient, provided the people shall deem it expedient, is to suggest an abandonment of the legislative function by those to whose wisdom and patriotism the Constitution has intrusted the prerogative of determining whether a law is or is not expedient. Can it be said in such case that any member of the legislature declares the prohibition or enactment to be expedient?

A statute to take effect upon a subsequent event, when it comes from the hands of the legislature, must be a law in presenti to take effect in futuro. On the question of the expediency of the law, the legislature must exercise its own judgment definitely and finally. If it can be made to take effect on the occurrence of an event, the legislature must declare the law expedient if the event shall happen, but inexpedient if it shall not happen. They can appeal to no other man or men to judge for them in relation to its present or future propriety or necessity; they must exercise that power themselves, and thus perform the duty imposed upon them by the constitution. But, in case of a law to take effect, if it shall be approved by a popular vote, no event affecting the expediency of the law is expected to happen. The expediency or wisdom of the law, abstractly considered, does not depend on a vote of the people. If it is unwise before the vote is taken, it is equally unwise afterward. The legislature has no more right to refer such a question to the whole people than to a single individual. The people are sovereigns, but their sovereignty must be exercised in the mode pointed out by the constitution. (Barto v. Himrod, 8 N. Y., 483; Rice v. Foster, 4 Harr., 479.)

It was argued that the general statute which prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors without license and the "local option" statute should be read as one law, and so reading them, that it is not left to the popular vote to give effect to the law, but only to determine whether licenses shall be issued under the law. This distinction seems to have been recognized by the Supreme Court of New Jersey in State v. Morris Common Pleas, 36 N. J., 72; S. C., 13 Am. Rep., 422. There a statute was sustained which, in itself, contained a prohibition of sales without license, and then left to the people in town meeting, to say whether licenses should be granted. The supreme court of that State, after stating the test to be whether the enactment, when it passed from the hands of the lawgivers, had taken the form of a complete law, said: "It (the statute) denounces as a misdemeanor, the selling of liquor without license; so far it is positive and free from any contingency; it is left to the popular vote to determine, not whether it should be lawful to sell without license, but whether the contingency should arise under which licenses should be granted." The New Jersey statute left the option whether licenses should or should not be granted to the people in "town meeting." The difference between the action of towns, as local governments, and a submission to the voters living in any merely territorial subdivision of a county, will be hereinafter pointed out. I do not think, however, that the distinction asserted by the Supreme Court of New Jersey can be maintained. A law being in operation authorizing the business of retailing liquors, provided a license be first obtained, the legislature enacts that the people of a town shall determine whether any license shall be granted. If they determine that licenses shall not be granted, none can be issued.

It is plain in such case that the lawmakers do not intend to establish the new rule, until it shall have other sanction and allowance than that of the legislature itself. Licenses were granted by authority of the old law; they can be prohibited only by a new law. But in the case supposed, the legislature does not determine that licenses shall not be granted, but leaves it to the popular vote to determine the very contingency which the legislature must determine for themselves, in order to give effect to the law.

It is certain that the sections of the general revenue law relating to licenses to vendors of liquors, remain in force until the vote is counted and announced, as required by the statute; it is equally certain (if the statute is valid) that these sections cease to have force from the time the vote is announced, if the majority is against license. By whom, in such case, are the provisions of the revenue law repealed or suspended—by the legislature or by the people of the town?

And we are thus brought to another question: Can this law be sustained as in effect conferring on "towns" the power of regulating within their limits the sale of intoxicating liquors?

In determining this question I do not deem it necessary to decide any of the following:

1. Can the officers of a city or town be empowered to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors; and, if so, can they prohibit the sale in certain quantities under the power to regulate it?

2. Can a city or town, by ordinance or by law, make that a criminal offense which is legalized by the general laws of that State?

3. Does an act of the legislature authorizing a by-law, the effect of which is to relieve those making sales of more than five gallons, within the town, from the payment of a license tax, which those engaged in the same business outside of the town are obliged to pay, violate the provision of the constitution: "All laws of a general nature must have a uniform operation"?

4. Would a law be unconstitutional which conferred a power upon the officers of a county or town, to be exercised at the option of the officers, provided the people of the county or town should vote in favor of the exercise of the power by the officers?

It is enough to say this statute can not be sustained as conferring on the towns the power referred to, because no "towns" have ever been created in this State.

Our constitution, in terms, makes it the imperative duty of the legislature to create certain local governments. "The legislature shall establish a system of county and town governments, which shall be as nearly uniform as practicable throughout the State." Article 11, section 4. "It shall be the duty of the legislature to provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages," etc. Article 4, section 37. The behest of the constitution as to "town" will be obeyed when a system of town governments shall be established by law. When the system shall be established, the towns may make such rules or by-laws as they shall be authorized to make by the statutes which shall give them life and entity. The bestowal on them of the power to make proper local rules or by-laws will not be a delegation of legislative power conferred on the senate and assembly, because, as was said in Houghton v. Austin, supra, the exercise of such power by the counties, towns, cities, and incorporated villages, is recognized by the same constitution which confers the general legislative power upon the State legislature.

LEGISLATURES CAN NOT DELEGATE AUTHORITY.

In the case of Lammert, appellant, against Lidwell, Sixty-second Missouri, page 188, found in Twenty-first American Reports, page 411, I quote from the decision of the court as follows:

By the constitution of this State the legislative power is vested in the general assembly, composed of the senate and house of representatives. They must exercise the legislative authority in the enactment of laws and they can not delegate their trust. The legislature can not propose a law and submit it to the people to pass or reject it by a general vote, for that would amount to legislation by the people. But a law may be passed, which is complete in itself, to take effect in a future contingency or upon the happening of an event.

The question has been before this court upon several occasions, and the line of distinction has been drawn in reference to the different character of such laws. There is a general law upon the statute in regard to the incorporation of towns, investing the county courts with power to declare them incorporated upon the performance of certain conditions by the inhabitants. This law was contested for the reason that it was a delegation of political power and that the proceedings of the court were legislative in their character. But the statute was decided to be valid on the ground that the corporation derived all its power from the law and that the court merely gave the law application when certain conditions were performed by the inhabitants. (Kayser v. Bremen, 16 Mo. 88; State v. Weatherby, 45 id. 17.) So, acts of the legislature authorizing towns, cities, and counties to subscribe stock in corporations and incur expenses for different purposes have been uniformly upheld. The validity of such laws has never been doubted since the decision in the City and County of St. Louis v. Alexander, 23 Mo., 483. The provision in the statute authorizing cities and towns to organize for school purposes, upon a vote of the people, has been declared constitutional (State v. Wilcox, 45 Mo., 458), and the township organization law was declared not to be liable to any objection, as it was a law which took effect from and after its passage, and where a majority of the voters in a county voted for it, their votes did not create the law, but placed the county voting for it within its provisions. (Town. Organ. Law, 55 Mo., 295.)

It may now be conceded as the established doctrine that statutes creating municipal corporations or imposing liabilities upon municipalities, or authorizing municipalities to incur debts and obligations, or to make improvements, may be referred to the popular vote of the districts immediately affected—that is to say, the people of such districts may decide whether they will accept the incorporation or will assume the burdens. This is the prevailing rule in reference to local measures. But in all these cases the legislature had enacted a complete and valid law, according to the prescribed usages governing the passage of laws, and the happening of the contingency or the future event, which furnishes the occasion for the exercise of the power, gives no additional efficacy to the law itself. It derives its whole vigor and vitality from the exercise of the legislative will and not from the vote of the people. But no body but the legislature can make or repeal a law. The provision of the road law of 1851, which declared that if the county court of any county should be of opinion that the provision of the act should not be enforced, they might, in their discretion, suspend the operation of the same for any specified length of time, and thereupon the act should become inoperative in such county for the period specified in such order; and thereupon order the roads to be opened and kept in good repair under the laws heretofore in force, or the special acts on the subject of roads and highways, were adjudged to be unconstitutional and void in this court, as attempting to confer upon the county courts legislative power. (State v. Fields, 17 Mo., 529.)

In one of the leading cases on the subject (Barto v. Himrod, 4 Seld., 483) the Legislature of New York framed a school law and submitted it to the people, one section providing that "the electors shall determine by ballot at the annual election to be held in November next whether this act shall become a law"; and a further provision was made, in another section, that in case a majority of all the votes cast should be against the law, then the act should be null and void; but if the majority was in favor of the law, then the act should become a law and take effect. It was held that the law was unconstitutional; that the legislature had no power to submit a proposed law to the people, nor had the people power to bind each other by it. The Legislature of Delaware passed an act to authorize the citizens of the several counties of the State to decide by ballot whether the license to retail intoxicating liquors should be permitted. By this act a general election was to be held, and, if a majority of votes in any county should be cast against license, it should not thereafter be lawful for any person to retail intoxicating liquors within such county, but if a majority should be cast in favor of license, then licenses might be granted in the county so voting in the manner and under the regulations in the act prescribed. The court in that State held that the act was void, as an attempted delegation of the trust to make laws. (Rice v. Foster, 4 Harr., 479.) So, in Pennsylvania, a license law was held unconstitutional on similar grounds. (Parker v. Com., 6 Penn. St., 507.) The question was recently discussed in New Jersey in a case testing the validity of the local-option law of that State, and the law was held to be constitutional on the ground that municipal corporations and townships, or the people thereof acting collectively, might be invested with authority to regulate or prohibit the retail of intoxicating liquors. (State v. Morris Com. Pl., 7 Vroom., 72; S. C., 13 Am. Rep., 422.) But the court placed the decision distinctly upon the fact that the legislature enacted the law, and that it derived all its force and vitality from the enactment.

The reasoning of the court was in perfect harmony with all the leading decisions. It was said that if the right to declare what the law shall be in one case may be referred to the people, the right to do so may be given in all cases, and thus the legislature may divest itself wholly of the power lodged in it by the fundamental law, until by subsequent legislation it shall be rescinded; that it is also obvious that it is not competent to delegate to the people the right to say whether an existing law shall be repealed or its operation suspended. To say that what is now the law shall not hereafter, or shall not for a specified time, be the law, is in effect to declare the law to be otherwise than it now is and is a clear exercise of the lawmaking power. The will of the legislature must be expressed in the form of a law by their own act. If it is left to the contingency of a popular vote to pronounce whether it shall take effect, it is not the will of the lawmakers but the voice of their constituents which molds the rule of action. If the vote is in the affirmative, it is law; if in the negative, it is not law. The vote makes or defeats the law, and thus the people are permitted unlawfully to resume the right of which they have divested themselves, by a written constitution, to declare by their own direct action what shall be law.

After pursuing this course of argument, the court declared, upon an examination of the act under consideration, that the test was whether the enactment, when it passed from the hands of the lawgiver, had taken the form of a complete law, and it was decided that it was a complete law. It denounced as a misdemeanor the selling of liquor without a license, so far as it was positive and free from any contingency. It left to the popular vote to determine, not whether it should be lawful to sell without license, but whether the contingencies should arise under which license might be granted.

Our form of government is a democracy, but it is a representative democracy. It is impracticable for the people to assemble in mass to make laws, hence the power was delegated to representatives chosen for that purpose. It is not only the right of the representatives, when assembled in the legislature, to make laws, but it is their duty to do so. When the people, through the Constitution, delegated the lawmaking power to the legislature, it conferred an authority and imposed a duty which could not be exercised by any other body of men. Therefore, every law, to have any binding force or validity, must, when it emanates from the legislative body, have the form and character of a complete enactment. It must operate by virtue of the legislative authority and not depend upon popular action or the people's suffrages for its vitality. If the law is regularly enacted according to the prescribed forms of legislative procedure, it may well be allowed to depend upon contingencies for its operation upon classes or localities, but it can not be made to depend for its existence upon any other than the legislative will.

Is the law we are now considering in reference to the restraint of animals a valid law or is it a mere proposition to the people of certain counties to make it a law if they see proper to do so? It is very evident that it can have no existence or obligatory force unless the same be imparted to it by a vote of the people. The title to the act does not purport to be the title of a general law or of a legislative enactment, but it declares that it is an act to prevent domestic animals from running at large in those counties which, by a majority vote, may decide to agree thereto; not an act of the legislature, but an act of the counties which may in reality adopt it. The title is a fair index and exponent of the true intent and meaning of the law. The first section provides that the county court of any county may submit to the voters the question of restraining domestic animals, and then it is declared in the second section that, if a majority of the votes in any county is in favor of the restraint, then it shall be unlawful in that county for animals to run at large, according to the provisions of the third section. The fourth section prohibits the county court from ordering a special election for the adoption of the law oftener than once in each year. In other words, this last section gives the voters of each county the authority, once in each year, to determine whether they will enact a law for their special benefit. If they decline, under the provisions of the first and second sections to legislate on the subject, then the law has no existence. The law is entirely special in its nature, and whilst under the construction that has been given to the clause in the Constitution in regard to special legislation, it has been held that the legislature was to judge whether the special law was needed or was applicable, it was at the most of even this construction a legislative discretion, and could be exercised only by the legislature. But here the legislature does not assume that, even in its opinion, the law is necessary in a given or particular county. It remits the question wholly to the county itself. The second, or amendatory act, is made entirely applicable to St. Louis County, and by the act the people of the county determine for themselves whether they shall enact a special law. It is true the last-named act does not provide for a new election, but the law only has any force or existence at all in the county by virtue of the election in the first instance. In examining the whole act I am unable to arrive at any other conclusion than that the law depends altogether on a vote of the people and that it should be declared void as being an attempt to exercise the lawmaking power by a body other than the legislature.

I therefore think the judgment should be reversed. All the judges concur except Judge Vories, who is absent. Judgment reversed.

In Sixty-first New Hampshire Reports, page 329, I find that the court has this to say in the case of State against Hayes:

In the organization of the State government, for reasons by them deemed sufficient, the people vested the supreme legislative power not in themselves, but in certain agents, as a personal trust to be executed under the obligation of an official oath. By this oath they bound each senator and representative "accepting the trust" to the support of the constitution and the constitutional performance of his fiduciary duty. (Constitution, Art. II, 84.) They were of opinion that while there might be good reason for granting to municipalities a limited power of making local law, it was not wise to attempt to carry on the work of State legislation in town meeting. They might have made an effort to overcome one of the difficulties of that method by authorizing a State committee to propose laws and requiring the governor to ascertain and proclaim the result of the popular vote in the manner adopted by the act of 1879. They preferred, and they established, a representative repuolic; and they did not confer upon the legislature the power of abolishing it, repealing the second article of the constitution, and changing the supreme law-making body into a committee on proposals. That power the legislature would have if they could transfer from themselves to others the responsibility of passing or refusing to pass a law of a nonlocal character. If the power of general legislation could be conveyed by the act of 1879 to those who might be induced to exercise it in town meeting, all laws cculd be made and repealed in the same way, and the reprecentative character of the government could easily be extinguished. If the senate and house can transfer the powers and responsibilities of general legislation, they can select their assignee, to whom all executive and judicial functions being also conveyed by the governor, council, courts, and juries, the concentrated despotism, prohibited by the thirty-seventh article of the bill of rights (Ashuelot R. R. Co. v. Elliot, 58 N. H., 451, 452, 453), can be introduced.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the logic of these decisions is absolutely incontrovertible. I shall not take the time to quote from these other decisions, but will put them in the RECORD. As I said in the case reported in Sixty-first New Hampshire, the various decisions on both sides of the question are very fully considered not only in the briefs of counsel but by the court itself, and the court reaches the conclusion that such laws are unconstitutional. As I said a while ago, there is much more reason for holding such a referendum unconstitutional in the District of Columbia than in any State in the Union.

WHY TEMPERANCE PEOPLE OPPOSE REFERENDUM IN DISTRICT.

Some will ask why the temperance people are asking for a referendum to the States on the question of national prohibition and are opposing a referendum to the people in the city for District prohibition. The reason is plain to anyone who will think it over, even for a moment. The one is clearly constitutional and the other is of doubtful validity. A referendum to the States, through their legislatures, to amend the National Constitution is the method provided by that instrument. A referendum direct to the people of the District of proposed legislation is not provided for in the Constitution and is of more than doubtful validity. Furthermore, there can be no justification in singling out one subject for a referendum when such a proceeding is wholly contrary to the policy of the Government of the District and especially so where there is neither a system of determining any electorate nor any machinery to record the will of any who might be enfranchised. Many interlocking questions must be considered before any such legislation is proposed. What sort of suffrage shall we have—manhood, equal, qualified, unqualified, limited, or unlimited? These must necessarily be determined before a referendum can be had. If the Congress wants to give sovereignty to the District, let it do so in the regular and constitutional way, and then after that referendums may be justified.

It is sought to scare the business men of the District of Columbia. The National Hotel Gazette, which seems to be one of the special advocates of the liquor traffic, in its issue of January 24, 1916, said:

Prohibition in Washington spells ruin for the Capital of the great Republic. It will cease being the show city of the Nation and will become a way place on the map of the country. It will be shunned by the traveler and hated by the resident. Real estate values will suffer immeasurably, and the activities of its municipal life will be greatly hampered.

This is certainly a direful and doleful prediction, but it is so extravagant as to carry with it its own refutation. I will, however, allow one to answer this prophecy who used substantially the same arguments in the city of Seattle last fall, when the State of Washington was about to vote upon the State-wide prohibition amendment to its constitution. Maj. C. B. Blethen is the energetic and able editor of the Seattle Times. Seattle is a seaport city almost as large as Washington. The Seattle Times opposed the prohibition amendment most vigorously. Prohibition carried, and Seattle became dry January 1 of this year.

FORMER OPPONENT OF PROHIBITION IN SEATTLE RELATES BENEFITS.

This is what Maj. Blethen said in an interview in the Kansas City Times of February 9, 1916:

My paper fought its damnedest against prohibition. We fought it on economic grounds alone. We believed that in a great seaport city with a population of upward of 300,000 prohibition would be destructive; it would bring on economic disaster. We believed that under our system of licensing saloons we had the liquor traffic about as well controlled as it could be, and we wanted to let it alone, and so we fought as hard as we could fight. But, in spite of all we could do against it, prohibition carried, and it went into effect in Washington January 1. We have had a month of it now.

And how has it worked out?

BUSINESS EXPANDED QUICKLY.

We already know that it is a great benefit morally and from an economic standpoint. Its moral benefit has been tremendous. Seattle had 260 saloons, and we had an average of 2,600 arrests a month for crimes and misdemeanors growing out of liquor drinking. In January we had only 400 arrests, and 60 of those were made January 1 and were the results of hang overs from the old year. That in itself is enough to convince any man with a conscience that prohibition is necessary. There can be no true economy in anything that is immoral.

And on top of that great moral result we have these economic facts: In the first three weeks of January the savings deposits in the banks of Seattle increased 15 per cent. There was not a grocery store in Seattle that did not show an increase of business in January greater than ever known in any month before in all the history of the city, except in holiday time. In all the large grocery stores the increase was immense. In addition to this, every dry-goods store in Seattle except one, and that one I have no figures from, had a wonderful increase in business. Each store reported the largest business ever done in one month, except in holiday time.

THE WOMEN AND CHILDREN PROFIT.

I wished to know in what class of goods the sales increased so greatly, and so I sent to all the grocery and dry goods stores to find that out. And to me it is a pitiful thing, and it makes me sorry that we did not have prohibition long ago—that the increase in sales in all the dry-goods stores was in wearing apparel of women and children and in the grocery stores the increase was made up chiefly of fruits and fancy groceries. This proves that it is the women and children who suffer most from the liquor business, and it is the women and children who benefit greatest from prohibition. Money that went formerly over the bar for whisky is now being spent for clothing for the women and children and in better food for the household.

It is just like this: When you close the saloons the money that formerly was spent there remains in the family of the wage earner, and his wife and children buy shoes and clothing and better food with it. Yes, sir; we have found in Seattle that it is better to buy shoes than booze. The families of wage earners in Seattle are going to have more food and clothes and everything else than they had before.

IT ACTUALLY PROHIBITS.

And is the prohibition law enforced?

Absolutely. Prohibition does prohibit.

And how about the empty saloons and the landlords who own them?

Many of them have already been made over and are occupied by other businesses. I will venture the prophecy that in one year from to-day you won't be able to find a place in Seattle where there was a saloon. They will all be occupied by other businesses. And prohibition has not lowered rents. I know of one big dry-goods store that has already had its rent raised since prohibition went into effect.

COAST STATES ALL WILL BE DRY.

Oregon also went dry January 1. California is the only wet State left on the Pacific coast, and it will go dry January 1, 1918. And those three States will remain dry to the end of time. None of them would ever have saloons again. Those who were honestly opposed, as I was, to prohibition in Washington and Oregon have been converted to it, as I have been, by the actual evidence that prohibition is a fine thing from a business standpoint. No city and no community, too, can afford to have saloons. They are too expensive, morally and economically. In a very few years there will not be a licensed saloon in the whole Nation, and that will be a fine thing.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I want to add to the statement of the Seattle Times, with regard to the effect of prohibition upon that city, the information which I received concerning the effect of prohibition upon the city of Denver, where I live. My information is that its effect there—and it went into operation on the 1st day of January—is confirmatory in every particular of the account given of its effect and operation in Seattle.

Mr. JONES. I could read statements from other cities and towns in my State, all bearing out this same statement; but the case was so well stated by Maj. Blethen, who was one of those who honestly opposed the proposed law in the first place, that it seemed to me sufficient to read his statement to the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. I interrupted the Senator from Washington also because the city of Denver is only a few thousand smaller in population than the city of Seattle, and the argument made in Denver against prohibition—and I thought there was a good deal of it—was along the same lines on which it was made by the editor of the paper from which the Senator has read. The prophecies and predictions which were made of the effect of prohibition upon large cities—it being conceded that it would not be the same in the smaller places—have all been unverified by the logic of events.

SUPPORTER OF REFERENDUM SHORT-SIGHTED.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the business men of this District who support this referendum are following a very short-sighted policy, in my judgment. Forty or fifty thousand residents of the District have retained their legal residences in the States from which they came. They did this under the law and the Constitution, and they certainly had a right to expect this status to continue until other provisions should be made for the preservation of their rights. They now have the right to vote for President, Senators, Representatives, and for State officers in their respective States. They are the best and most intelligent residents of the District and of the principal customers of these business men, except of the saloons.

If this referendum is submitted, these people must disfranchise themselves and lose all the rights which they prize so highly, in order to vote upon one proposition here or else they must refuse to vote upon such a proposition, although it may be of the greatest interest to them. What does any business man hope to gain by slapping these people in the face this way? If he seeks financial gain, he will surely be the loser in the end. Who will be the gainer from that condition? The saloon interest, and it knows it.

He is shortsighted in allying himself with that baneful traffic that is more and more becoming obnoxious to the best sentiment of the Nation. This is the people's Capital. It is maintained for the Nation and not alone for the residents of the District. Every section of the country is interested in making this the most beautiful Capital of the world, and they want it beautiful in morals, intelligence, and in those conditions that make for happiness and comfort in the home. I went all over my State last summer telling of the beauties of our Capital, and the statement that this is the Capital of the whole country and that all the people are interested in it and that it should be made the most beautiful Capital in the world was enthusiastically approved. Make them believe that the business men of Washington have no regard for the moral sentiment of the country in the gratification of their own selfish desires, and they will make their displeasure felt in a way that will not promote the selfishness of such business men. There is a moral sentiment in Congress that is going to become stronger as the force for decency, good living, law and order increases. They would better ally themselves with that force rather than with that interest which thrives on vice, corruption, desolated homes, ruin, and financial and moral wreckage.

Those who believe in self-government for the District will not help their cause by favoring this referendum, assuming that Congress has authority under the Constitution to grant legislative self-government to the people of the District. It simply lets the people say "yes" or "no" upon a single proposition under the most unfavorable circumstances. Instead of furthering self-government, it will undoubtedly retard it.

There is also a sentiment, growing stronger and stronger and which will eventually prevail, that the women of the country are as intelligent and as capable of voting as the men. No one will deny that the women of any locality are as capable of passing upon the question of prohibition as men, if not more so. They know what the liquor traffic is; they know how it works; they know its terrible effect upon the flour barrel, the clothes closet, the bank account, the bodily health, the morality of humanity and the happiness of homes more even than men. She it is that must endure the most intense suffering that comes from the liquor traffic. This is said to be a referendum to the people. The people's will, we are told, should control on this great moral issue; and yet every ignorant, besotted, vicious, corrupt, and unconvicted man is permitted to vote under this so-called people's referendum upon this great moral issue, while every intelligent, refined, educated, pure, home-loving, God-fearing woman is excluded from voting upon it.

Stripped of all the gloss of political liberty and professions of friendship for the people's will, this proposition is a plan that will permit crime, debauchery, corruption, ignorance, and intimidation to ally itself with something of decency and intelligence in behalf of a traffic that produces more crime, more poverty, more sorrow, more suffering, and more broken hearts and desolated homes than any influence since the world began, and to exclude the highest intelligence, the sweetest influence, and the strongest civilizing force in the world from assisting in the overthrow of this accursed traffic. Stripped of all its professions of personal rights and political privileges, this referendum might well say with the Veiled Prophet of Khorassan:

Here judge if hell, with all its power to damn,
Can add one curse to the foul thing I am.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it was not my intention to take up the time of the Senate in a discussion of the subject of the Government manufacture of armor as provided in Senate bill 1417, because I had hoped and expected that members of the committee reporting the bill would favor the Senate with a full and complete statement in regard to the measure. Not having had the pleasure of hearing the bill discussed and explained, I concluded to carefully examine the hearings, the bill, and the report.

I am opposed to the bill for several reasons, but will take the time of the Senate only long enough to mention one or two of them.

It seems to me that before voting upon this measure, which calls for an appropriation of $11,000,000 and will likely take much more from the Treasury if the project is authorized, the Senate should consider the condition of the Treasury and the calls that are likely to be made upon it within the next year. The excess of ordinary disbursements over ordinary receipts up to March 16 for the fiscal year 1916 amount to $59,927,291.55. The estimates of the regular annual appropriations for the year ending July 1, 1917, amount to $1,285,857,808.16, which is an increase of $195,082,673.78 over the estimates for the year ending July 1, 1916. It must be remembered that the estimates for 1917 are the largest ever before sent to Congress, and the indications are that a much larger sum will be called for and appropriated before the year is ended.

In view of the fact that this administration has been compelled to resort to a war tax in the time of peace, and the majority in Congress is now looking for more items to add to the war-tax list it seems to me that the exercise of good judgment would cause Congress to make no appropriations except those which are actually needed. Measures that are not necessary should be delayed until some future time.

The bill calls for an appropriation of $11,000,000, but a careful reading of the hearings will convince anyone that a much larger sum will be required if the project is undertaken. I desire to call your attention to pages 137 and 138 of the hearings:

Senator CHILTON. How much armor plate will the Government require from this time on by the naval program?

Admiral STRAUSS. It will require about 120,000 tons of armor in the next five years.

Senator CHILTON. About 25,000 tons a year?

Admiral STRAUSS. It will require 113,000 tons actually to be placed on ships and then the test plates amounting to about 7 per cent must be added to that; in other words, they will have to produce about 120,000 tons in the five-year period.

Senator CHILTON. This bill provides for a plant to cost not exceeding $11,000,000. Have you gone into that question? I believe you said you had, and that that would build a plant that would produce about 10,000 tons a year?

Admiral STRAUSS. No, sir; that was for the 20,000-ton plant.

Senator CHILTON. This $11,000,000 is?

Admiral STRAUSS. Yes, sir.

Senator CHILTON. That would not be quite as much as we would need, would it?

Admiral STRAUSS. If the building program is carried out, it calls for 24,000 tons per annum average.

Senator CHILTON. What arrangements did you have in mind, or has the department in view, to provide the other 4,000 tons?

Admiral STRAUSS. We have made no arrangement for the other 4,000 tons.

Senator CHILTON. Have you made any estimate or investigation to enlighten the committee as to how soon with this expenditure we could begin the production of armor?

Admiral STRAUSS. We estimated we would have the plant completed in three years from the time that we were authorized to construct it. That estimate was made about a year ago, and undoubtedly now the time would have to be increased and the cost would have to be increased if the present prices and demand for all these materials remains as at present.

Senator CHILTON. In other words, you can see at least three years of an interim before we could begin the production of armor plate, before the plant would be ready. Now, what is your idea of what would become of us in the three years intervening; what would we do for armor plate in the meantime?

Admiral STRAUSS. We would have to buy our armor plate just where we are buying all of it to-day, from existing manufacturers.

Senator CHILTON. Supposing they would quit making it? Have you contracts covering that period?

Admiral STRAUSS. No, sir.

To show that there is quite a difference of opinion as to what such a plant would cost, I desire to call your attention to pages 139 and 140 of the hearings:

Senator PENROSE. Admiral, you have stated that this $11,000,000 would build a plant that would have a capacity of about 20,000 tons a year?

Admiral STRAUSS. Yes, sir.

Senator PENROSE. Mr. Dinkey has stated to-day that, in his opinion, it would build a plant with a capacity of ten or twelve thousand tons. There is considerable difference of opinion here. I would like to ask Mr. Dinkey whether he can explain it.

Mr. DINKEY. I think I have had a little more experience in the business than the admiral has had; and for a great many years I have been very careful to make my estimates a little higher than I did previously, because I have had some very bitter experiences before boards of directors when I overran my estimates. So I think to build a 20,000-ton plant for $11,000,000 you would find it overrun a very great deal.

Senator PENROSE. We have struck a very serious difference of opinion as to capacity, varying 100 per cent. Now, I would like to find out just what difference there is in cost to the Government?

Mr. GRACE. In reference to the cost of plants, if you wanted me to speak on that, as we deducted at Bethlehem at the same time this report was being made, I would say I had our engineers prepare an estimate for me of what it would cost us to build at that time a 20,000-ton plant; and I have not those figures with me, but it is somewhere between $14,000,000 and $15,000,000.

Then, again, your attention is called to pages 156 and 157 of the hearings.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. What is your idea, Mr. Secretary, of the amount of armor plate that would be required per year for the next five years? It is 25,000 tons a year, as I understand it?

Secretary DANIELS. If this program goes through we would need 120,000 tons.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. About 25,000 tons a year for the next five years.

Senator CHILTON. That is 113,000 for our actual needs, and then 7,000 tons for testing purposes.

Senator SMITH of Maryland. Is it your idea the Government should make about 20,000 tons of that per year?

Secretary DANIELS. That is a matter, Senator, for the Congress. My estimates, made in November, allowed for a factory that would make 10,000 tons a year. In the report of the committee they pointed out that you could make it much cheaper if you made 20,000 tons, which, of course, is true.

The distinguished chairman of the committee, in a statement to be found in the hearings on page 166, tells how the question of the cost of constructing a 20,000-ton plant was reached. It is very interesting.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, as to this proposition for a 20,000-ton plant, the estimate of cost is based upon its running all the while—three shifts. It is not customary to run Government plants 24 hours in a day. Therefore, unless there is an emergency, we could reduce the time of manufacturing armor to eight hours a day, and jog along in that way, and the cost would not be as much as we are now paying.

Mr. BARBA. It is not possible, Mr. Chairman, to run an armor plant 8 hours a day. It is not physically possible.

Mr. GRACE. The operations require continuous work.

Mr. BARBA. The operations require absolutely continuous performance 24 hours a day 7 days a week.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the heat has to be maintained?

Mr. BARBA. Yes, sir. I instanced a week ago in my testimony one operation, which is common to every armor plant, which requires from 18 to 25 days' continuous operation at a temperature of 2,000° F. without cessation. You can not do that on an 8-hour basis.

Mr. BARBA. You can do that in the case of machines where the tools may stand idle.

The CHAIRMAN. My judgment would be it would be possible for the Government armor factory to run on those processes which are not necessarily continuous in such a way as not to make it necessary, and you could get the same results, and you could expand and run 24 hours a day in an emergency.

Mr. BARBA. But, Senator TILLMAN, where does your cost go under such an operation as that? When you are working 8 hours a day and the plant is idle 16 hours a day, everything stops more than 16 hours a day. It takes longer than 8 hours a day to pick up and get going. You need a little manufacturing experience, Senator, to show you the truth of these statements I am making to you.

There are now three plants, privately owned, which are able to furnish the Government all the armor it needs and more, and it is perfectly evident that a Government plant is not needed, and Admiral Strauss admits that there would be no especial advantage to the Government in going into the business if the private firms would furnish armor at a fair profit, and will continue to do so under all conditions. (See hearings, p. 145.)

In this connection I would like to print, as a part of my remarks, a short editorial on that feaure of the subject which covers the question fully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

GOVERNMENT ARMOR PLANTS.

No more fallacious theory could be held by men responsible for shaping national policies than the plan of the Senate Naval Committee to establish Government armor-making plants. The Government could not successfully operate such a plant, and should not if it could. Senator TILLMAN, in presenting the committee's report urging Government ownership, declared that the armor-plate manufacturers are in the habit of "holding up" the Government as to prices, and that their "stand-and-deliver" policy is responsible for the determination to have the Government make its own plate.

It is not necessary to challenge the correctness of Senator TILLMAN'S assertion regarding the attitude of manufacturers in order to show the unwisdom of the course he advocates. It may be true, doubtless it is true, that the three large manufacturers of armor plate, who practically control the industry, have made the Government pay substantial prices—perhaps exorbitant prices. The remedy which the Senator prescribes though, is really worse than the disease. It would surely result in a much higher cost for the plate turned out, and it would reverse the true policy which the Government should pursue.

It is preposterous to say that the Government must submit to the exactions of private manufacturers in such a matter, or that its only means of escape is a heavy investment in a plant of its own and heavy maintenance of operative charges permanently. Making armor plate is not a function of Government; and submitting weakly to the exactions of armor-plate manufacturers is by no means a necessity. Armor plate is essential to the defense of the Nation, and, as such, its manufacture comes well within the Government's right of control. In this matter, as in many other phases of "preparedness," the Government's wise policy is to encourage private manufacturers in every possible way, but to control them as well. That is to say, the Government should insist on establishing a cost basis for turning out armor plate, allow a reasonable profit, and possibly allow a fixed sum per annum for the right, in emergencies, to work the plant to its fullest capacity according to the Government's needs.

Such a policy would tie up private enterprise to the Government on a profitable basis, but it would not tie up the Government to a costly manufacturing project. The Nation would control, as it has an undoubted right to control, as to quantity and price of output; but the work of developing new ideas and of bettering quality would be left where it properly belongs, and would be paid for on a basis fair to all.

Private enterprise, made keenly alive to its responsibility to the Nation and held to that responsibility by the power of the Government, would spell efficiency and economy. It would keep politics entirely out of our "preparedness" plans, whatever they may be, and give the country a dependable source of supply for all its needs.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the bill now under consideration is accompanied by a very unusual, not to say remarkable, report; unusual in the admissions which it makes and remarkable in its demonstration of the animus which seems to have actuated those who are advocating this legislation. I quote from the second paragraph of the report:

The relation of the United States Government to the armor-plate manufacturers has been a continual source of dissatisfaction to those Members of Congress who really do not believe in the doctrine of favoritism to the special interests or in the protective system at all, and a condition has existed little short of scandalous.

It would be difficult to make any connection between the protective system—a system which this country undoubtedly favors—and the making of armor plate. Under the law as it exists the Secretary of the Navy can not purchase armor plate abroad, and therefore it must be constructed either by the Government or by private manufacturers in this country. The possibility, therefore, of the protective system affecting it in any way is utterly absurd. That being the case, in what way has favoritism influenced special interests in this industry and what is the condition that is little short of scandalous? There are three firms manufacturing armor plate, having a total capacity of at least two and one-half times the average output during the last 16 years. That there have not been additional plants established is quite apparently due to two reasons—one, that already the market is oversupplied with a capacity to manufacture, and another that it requires a very large investment in order to construct a plant suitable for this purpose. If there were any possibility of steady and profitable employment, of course, there would be additional manufactories established, but the uncertainty of Government work, the dependence on the whims of Congress from year to year about the amount of armor to be manufactured, and the other burdensome conditions which accompany manufacturing for the Government have very naturally been sufficient to deter other manufacturers from undertaking this business.

Is it favoritism to special interests for this Government to buy what it needs of its own citizens, of plants represented by large numbers of stockholders and employees, and is it scandalous for them to consult with the Navy Department about the contracts which they are asked to take? If such a condition is true, it opens up a very interesting proposition. If it is so, why does not the party now in power repeal the provisions which prevent the Secretary of the Navy buying from foreign manufacturers and open this particular product to the competition of the world? It is apparent that there are two reasons for not doing this, one being that it would not be a fortunate political move and another being that it would be contrary to every reasonable public policy to allow the citizens of other countries to manufacture those things which are vital to our preparation for national defense.

This report goes on to say that from 1887 to 1915 investigation has followed investigation without result. Why has there been no result if it has been advisable to make a change? Congress has been in the hands of the Democratic Party three times since the first date mentioned. If it has been desirable to make a change, why has not the change been made? The reason is that heretofore those who have believed that better results might be obtained if the Government manufactured armor plate have on investigation failed to find sufficient reasons for making any change and have abandoned the attempt. It has remained for the present Committee on Naval Affairs, without sufficient knowledge and with no really accurate basis for its conclusions, to propose to put the Government into the manufacture of this material.

It is true that there is only one customer in the United States for this product—the Government; but it is not true that there are no other customers, as is evidenced by the fact that sales have already been made abroad; that we recently obtained the building of a battleship for the Argentine Government, and American armor was used for that purpose; that the possibility of developing this business is very material, a possibility which, however, would at once be eliminated if we turn over to the Government the manufacturing of armor instead of continuing to purchase of private producers. No foreign Government would consider for a minute the question of purchasing armor from another Government manufacturer.

It is especially important that we continue in condition to supply the needs of South American countries. This administration is advocating closer relations, even those relating to the question of offense and defense, with the countries in South America. It is desirable to standardize the material used in national defense, and if those countries can be induced to use our material until they have for the time being supplied their needs it will, from the very nature of the requirements, lead them to continue to use material manufactured in this country. When the Secretary of the Treasury and a commission are on their way to South America, and when other agencies are actively employed to bring about closer business arrangements between the United States and that continent, for us to deliberately legislate on this subject in such a way that it precludes the possibility of obtaining this business is shortsighted and foolish in the extreme.

The report goes on to say, speaking of there being but three armor-plate manufactories in the country:

> The result is either a monopoly or a combine of the worst type.

I have carefully read the testimony taken by the committee, and I find neither of these statements corroborated. There is certainly not a monopoly, because there are three distinct manufactories which have different officers, different stockholders, and are located in different sections of the State of Pennsylvania. There is not a word of testimony that there is any collusion between them; in fact, the evidence shows that one of the companies failed one year recently to receive any business direct from the department. An attempt was evidently made to disprove the denial that there was a collusion. For instance, on page 52 of the report of the committee I find the following, which presents not only the denial of there being a combination but indicates better than could be done otherwise the temper with which the members of the committee have seemed to approach this subject. It can not be encouraging to business men of the United States to undertake work for the Government if they must be told when submitting testimony that it is not true or probably is not true.

I desire to insert in my speech an extract from the hearings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> The CHAIRMAN. You have got some appliances down there that are needed only for making armor?
> Mr. DINKEY. Yes, sir; and they can not be used for anything else.
> The CHAIRMAN. And, therefore, they would be a dead loss to you if the Government should go into the manufacture of its own armor. The Government is helpless, so far as the price of armor is concerned when there are only three makers of it, and they are working in combination, charging whatever price they agree upon.
> Mr. DINKEY. The three are not in collusion.
> The CHAIRMAN. You say so; but we think they are. I hope you are telling the truth.
> Mr. DINKEY. I can tell you now that they are not in collusion, and I do not know how I can make you believe that I am telling the truth.
> The CHAIRMAN. The fact that Carnegie did not get any of this last contract would indicate that somehow or other the cogs had slipped and the machine did not work well. Do you know just why you did not get it? Are you willing to tell?
> Mr. DINKEY. I tried hard enough to get it, but could not. I tried to meet the Secretary's views, and I did revise my bids after he asked us to, and I did not make them sufficiently low, I imagine.
> Mr. PADGETT. Upon that question, however, the contract was awarded to the other two with the stipulation that they could sublet part of the contract, and you are not out of the game yet.
> Mr. DINKEY. The deliveries required are faster than the plants that have the contracts will be able to make them.
> The CHAIRMAN. Therefore they will have to come to you, because you are the only other man that can help them out. Don't you know that you have got the Government in your power?
> Mr. DINKEY. I do not think I have.
> The CHAIRMAN. If the Government can only get from certain factories its armor, and nobody else can supply it, it seems to me that the Government is utterly helpless.
> Mr. DINKEY. Look at the other side. These tools are useful only for Government work. If the Government does not buy they lie idle.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have read these hearings very carefully, and I want to say to the Senate that I did not find in those hearings a single line, not one word, from an expert that would justify the Government of the United States in undertaking to build this armor plant. Further than that, I did not find any expert testimony that would justify the statement in the report that the plant could be constructed for $11,000,000.

I ask—because I believe the Senate should do it—every Senator to read the hearings before he votes upon this question next Tuesday.

INCREASE OF NUMBER OF CADETS AT WEST POINT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4876) to provide for an increase in the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I think the amendment I have to the amendment is now in order.

I move that after the word "Army," in the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, the words "and the National Guard" be inserted.

That makes necessary two other amendments in the same section. Also, on page 2, line 10, after the word "Army," insert "and the National Guard." Also, on page 2, line 14, after the word "Army," insert "and the National Guard."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, after the word "Army," insert "and the National Guard," so that the proviso will read:

> Provided, however, That the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy thus selected by the President from the enlisted men in the Army and the National Guard shall not at any one time exceed 300.

Then, on page 2, line 10——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that he simply amend the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. Then, of course, if the Senate accepts that amendment, he can offer the other amendments to the bill.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator, though, would not accept it. I did submit it to him.

Mr. SMOOT. I say, if the Senate accepts it—not the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. JAMES. I think, though, this amendment that I offered to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri makes necessary these other changes.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; they ought to follow, and if the Senate accepts one they will accept the other.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The first question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, which perfects the other amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from Missouri as now amended by the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, and agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The section as amended would read:

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized to appoint cadets to the United States Military Academy from among enlisted men of the Regular Army and the National Guard between the ages of 19 and 22 years who have served as enlisted men not less than one year, to be selected under such regulations as the President may prescribe, at the rate of five for each regiment of the mobile Army and the National Guard and equivalent units of organizations of other arms, and the Corps of Cadets is hereby increased to the number necessary to provide for maintaining hereafter five representatives of each organization as herein prescribed: Provided, however, That the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy thus selected by the President from the enlisted men in the Army and the National Guard shall not at any one time exceed 300.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment as amended.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee how many cadets in all will be at the Military Academy under this plan?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if this amendment is adopted, it will increase the number so that they can not possibly be accommodated at this time. That was one of the main reasons why I objected to the amendment and I hope the Senate will vote it down.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator says it will increase it beyond the accommodations?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I did not hear what the total number would be. I should like to know what it will be.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will state to the Senator that without this proposed amendment, with the Army as at present organized, there would be 1,196.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This amendment increases it by 240. We already have one from each regiment provided for in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please address the Chair. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield. Does the Senator desire me to answer that question? As at present organized, this bill would practically double the present Cadet Corps in the academy. It would make it amount to about 1,196, with the Army as at present organized.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Just a moment. That would be the number provided for by this bill; and with the Army as at present organized, if Congress passes the bill that is pending before the Senate for the reorganization of the Army, it will increase that number still more—about 60 more—and that would be about 1,250 or 1,260 altogether. If we add to it what is proposed by this amendment—what was the maximum?

Mr. SMOOT. Not to exceed 300.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That would be something like 1,500 or 1,600 men.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator a question. Is it not true that the bill already covers one for each regiment, and there will be about 90 regiments, so that the provision of 5 for each regiment, not to exceed 300, would only add about 210?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; but this provides for the National Guard also.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The amendment limits the total appointees by the President to 300. The bill already carries 1 for each regiment—about 90, after the Army increase—so that the increase covered by the proposed amendment could not be over 210.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I should like to say one word on this very important question. It is absolutely essential to the support and development of any military body to consider carefully the origin of its officers, and the selection and education that developes these officers.

The Senate has just passed an order—and I am much obliged to it—for the purpose of printing the Swiss military law. That law has created one of the greatest citizen armies in the world. With it will be printed the last reports from our military attachés at Berne. The Swiss Army is based upon great military and democratic principles. One of these great principles in that law is this: That in order to be a noncommissioned officer a man must go through a school to which he is nominated by his superior officers. In order to be a commissioned officer he must go through a school for commissioned officers to which he is nominated by his superior officers. So that there is a selection there by the men who can best judge of the capacity of the candidate for the military office to handle men.

This system of sending boys, wholly untested in any school of effort, to West Point, by the Senate and by the House and by the President, gives no selection as to the capacity to handle men of those candidates for West Point's military opportunity; but this provision for the choice of West Point candidates from these two great bodies of troops, the National Guard and the Regular Army, gives an opportunity for the selection by the men over them of the best element in each company or each regiment for the handling of men and the making of officers.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The bill does not in any way change the method of selecting from that which has obtained in this country for the last 50 years. Has the Senator any criticism to make of the results of the old system, which has been in vogue so long? West Point has turned out pretty good men under the old way of selecting them, and by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] you have men selected from the Army who have given one year of service and have shown their fitness for the very things that the Senator has just mentioned in the Swiss plan. I can not see the wisdom of changing, since the old way, tested by time and trial, has proven so satisfactory. I confess that I was never much inclined to imitate even the best systems of Europe. I am intensely American in all my ideas, tastes, and aspirations.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, of course in any noncompetitive system of selection you will have a large number of persons passing through the machinery of the Military Academy who will pass intellectually but who are not real officers, not handlers of men; and I venture to say that there is a percentage of the officers of the Regular Army of the United States who could not stand alone except for the support and system of the great army plan.

Without dealing with that question any further, because it is merely a question of guesswork, so to speak, this great Swiss system—and the President of the United States has the authority here to put in operation something quite like it—this law that we are about to pass provides for the selection under such regulations as the President may prescribe; and it is almost a certainty that the President of the United States will prescribe some regulation whereby the commanding officer has an opportunity to say something about the fitness of the would-be cadet. Under this great Swiss system the first start in army command is given, according to the language of that law, to those who are described as "apt men," and that aptness is ascertained from their service in the first period as recruits, and later. So we have here in this amendment, giving five West Point appointments to the enlisted men of each regiment of the Regular Army and National Guard, a popular idea, recognizing also the great army of citizen soldiers of the United States, recognizing the rank and file of the Army of the United States, and at the same time, in my humble judgment, tending a great deal to strengthen the manly qualities that already exist in the officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it seems to me there is a great deal in what the Senator from Maryland says upon this subject. I think that if we are going to establish an improved military system everything should be done that is possible to make the service under that system as honorable a service as possible.

We all know that the Regular Army, well organized as it is, and handsomely as it has conducted itself upon every occasion, is not an attractive service to the best youth of the country, and that it never has been. That probably will always attach to a merely paid service, a regular service of volunteers, where the members volunteer and are not drawn upon by the Government as a matter of patriotic duty and patriotic obligation. I imagine, however, that any system that is adopted by Congress in the near future will involve not only a Regular Army but a citizen soldiery, and service in that citizen soldiery will doubtless be a very honorable service and will be sought after; for I have no doubt that the effort of Congress will be to make it attractive and helpful to young men in reaching out for civil vocations, as well as for military training.

I believe that the opening of West Point to men of talent and merit who have shown their ability in the service, as has been proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], will be of great service in attracting the best young men of the country into the citizen soldiery, whatever the name may be; and I believe that we might well enlarge that inducement. I see no reason at all, under the new system of efficiency which is to be developed, why Senators and Congressmen should select the men who are intended for West Point. It seems to me that all of these appointments to West Point ought to be held out as the rewards for merit.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator was formerly a distinguished Member of the House, as he now is of the Senate. Does he believe that the Members of the House would consent to a bill of that kind going through the House?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I merely throw that out as a suggestion now. I am not going to make any motion to that effect. I think it is a most unfortunate aspect of the case when we are told that simply because Senators and Members of the House of Representatives have at present this form of patronage—for that is what it is—they would adhere to it at the expense of the efficiency of a great military and naval organization which they are about to create.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I would suggest to the Senator that there is one advantage in the appointment or recommendation of cadets by the Senators and Congressmen in that it distributes throughout the Republic the favors of the General Government and it brings to the service of the Government citizens from the different States. In that fact, I think, there is great merit. It will equalize and preserve the broad nonsectional American spirit which is an essential element and worthy of consideration.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But that merit could be preserved in the system I suggest.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It ought to be preserved.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill says they shall be apportioned, as far as practicable, among the States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes; and I think that idea should not be lost sight of. I think the appointments ought to go as a reward of merit in so far as possible.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It seems to me so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But it is very well to preserve the equilibrium by having the Army made up of citizens from every State in the Republic and from the colonies, since we have become a colony-owning country.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I was not here when the amendment was presented, nor have I heard it discussed. Does the proposed amendment eliminate all applicants except those coming from the Regular Army or the National Guard?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, no. There is no amendment to that effect. I am simply making a suggestion that we might well enlarge the operation of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky so that all the appointments to West Point should be made as the rewards of merit in the active service of the citizen soldiery, and partially of the Regular Army. I believe that system would attract many young men into the Army and the military service who otherwise would not be attracted.

I see nothing at all of any value in the power of appointment that Senators and Representatives have. It was the best expedient at the time, I imagine, for the selection of officers of the Regular Army impartially from all parts of the country. We are now, however, entering upon methods for the preparation of an efficient system, whereas heretofore we have had an inefficient system; and it seems to me all these matters ought to be taken out of patronage and ought to be the result of merit, and of merit which has been proved by actual service and experience in the Army.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator having the bill in charge that it is now 10 minutes of 5 o'clock on Saturday afternoon, and I doubt very much whether we can get a vote upon this amendment without a yea-and-nay call. I believe it would be impossible to get a quorum at this time, and I suggest to the Senator that he move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am very reluctant to do that, Mr. President; but this is a matter of very great importance to the proposed plan of preparedness, if we are going to have any, and it is a matter of vital importance to the Military Academy as well. There are only about 15 or 20 Senators here, if that many. In view of the importance of the matter, and the fact that nothing would be decided by a vote now, I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Utah and move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 20, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 18, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, Source of all good, humbly and reverently we bow in Thy presence. Help us to make dominant in all the transactions of our daily life the higher qualities of mind and soul, for we realize that to be pure is to be strong; to be sincere is to be courageous; to be generous is to be noble; to be self-sacrificing is to be Christlike; to be just and merciful is to be Godlike. Thus graciously guide us by Thy holy influence. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

STREET RAILWAY COMPANIES, HAWAII.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 65) to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to certain gas, electric-light and power, telephone, railroad, and street railway companies and franchises in the Territory of Hawaii, and amending the laws relating thereto, with Senate amendments thereto, and move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 17.

Whereas it is understood that the President has ordered or is about to order the armed forces of the United States to cross the international boundary line between this country and Mexico for the pursuit and punishment of the band of outlaws who committed outrages on American soil at Columbus, N. Mex.; and

Whereas the President has obtained the consent of the de facto government of Mexico for this punitive expedition; and

Whereas the President has given assurance to the de facto government that the use of this armed force shall be for the sole purpose of apprehending and punishing said lawless band, and that the military operations now in contemplation will be scrupulously confined to the object already announced, and that in no circumstance will they be suffered to trench in any degree upon the sovereignty of Mexico or develop into intervention of any kind: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the use of the armed forces of the United States for the sole purpose of apprehending and punishing the lawless band of armed men who entered the United States from Mexico on the 9th day of March, 1916, committed outrages on American soil, and fled into Mexico, is hereby approved; and that the Congress also extends its assurance to the de facto government of Mexico and to the Mexican people that the pursuit of said lawless band of armed men across the international boundary line into Mexico is for the single purpose of arresting and punishing the fugitive band of outlaws; that the Congress in approving the use of the armed forces of the United States for the purposes announced joins with the President in declaring that such military expedition shall not be permitted to encroach in any degree upon the sovereignty of Mexico or to interfere in any manner with the domestic affairs of the Mexican people.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4889. An act to permanently renew patent No. 21053.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 562) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a Postal Savings System, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. TOWNSEND as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SENATE BILL AND RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill and Senate concurrent resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4889. An act to permanently renew patent No. 21053; to the Committee on Patents.

Senate concurrent resolution 17.

Whereas it is understood that the President has ordered or is about to order the armed forces of the United States to cross the international boundary line between this country and Mexico for the pursuit and punishment of the band of outlaws who committed outrages on American soil at Columbus, N. Whereas the President has given assurance to the de facto government that the use of this armed force shall be for the sole purpose of apprehending and punishing said lawless band, and that the military operations now in contemplation will be scrupulously confined to the object already announced, and that in no circumstance will they be suffered to trench in any degree upon the sovereignty of Mexico or develop into intervention of any kind: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the use of the armed forces of the United States for the sole purpose of apprehending and punishing the lawless band of armed men who entered the United States from Mexico on the 9th day of March, 1916, committed outrages on American soil, and fled into Mexico, is hereby approved; and that the Congress also extends its assurance to the de facto government of Mexico and to the Mexican people that the pursuit of said lawless band of armed men across the international boundary line into Mexico is for the single purpose of arresting and punishing the fugitive band of outlaws; that the Congress in approving the use of the armed forces of the United States for the purposes announced joins with the President in declaring that such military expedition shall not be permitted to encroach in any degree upon the sovereignty of Mexico or to interfere in any manner with the domestic affairs of the Mexican people—

HARBOR COMMISSIONERS, HAWAII.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I also call up from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 3042) to ratify, approve, and confirm sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory, as herein amended, and amending the laws relating thereto, with a Senate amendment thereto, and move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12766, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the very able statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] explaining the bill under consideration yesterday did not, as I recall it, embody any suggestion that the bill had the approval of the executive department. After the gentleman had made his statement, there was introduced into the RECORD by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] a letter signed, apparently, by the Secretary of War, indicating that the bill was fallacious, and that there might be a very marked difference of opinion as between the War Department or the Executive and the Committee on Military Affairs. A number of the Members of the House, I am sure, desire to be informed whether, when they vote on this bill, they will be voting in accordance with the wishes of the President of the United States and the War Department, and upon suggestions made by them. Does the gentleman care to explain this morning whether or not the bill as he has presented it, generally speaking, has the approval of the White House and of the War Department?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I am authorized to state by the President of the United States that this bill meets his approval. In other words, it is his bill; it carries out the recommendations which he made to Congress when he addressed Congress at its convening in December last. It goes a little further than the President asked us to go. It is true that the continental army is not provided for in this bill, but the President, in recommending a continental army, recommended machinery by which military forces should be raised in time of peace that will be ready in time of war.

The President thinks this bill, as it is drawn, makes the National Guard a sufficient force in time of peace to be used in time of war, and that it meets the purpose he had in mind. The Secretary of War, of course, agrees with the President, and I may say, in broad language, that this is the President's bill and that he thoroughly approves of it. I will call attention to what Secretary of War Baker says about these figures and read the last sentence in his communication to Mr. GARDNER. In concluding his letter Mr. Baker said:

You will, of course, understand that accurate information on this subject is not available, and that therefore the figures I am giving you are at best only approximate.

I desire to say that the figures in my report were taken from the evidence of The Adjutant General of the Army, who has charge of that part of the War Department which deals with subjects of this sort. The figures contained in the letter of the Secretary came from the War College. I will not discuss the reason why the War College undertook to make an argument in this communication against the figures which have been given by The Adjutant General of the Army.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One more question, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is probably aware of the fact that there has been a great misunderstanding, both in the House and throughout the country, as to what the President actually desired with respect to armed merchantmen. Since the Army bill now under consideration has come into the House, there is an evident misunderstanding of the attitude of the administration toward the bill, on which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and his committee have worked so industriously. In view of the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] yesterday the country might be led to a still further misunderstanding. It seems important, if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is able and willing to do so, that the gentleman shall inform the House whether the administration is actually supporting what we now commonly know as the Hay bill.

Mr. HAY. It is; and I may say that this is, after all, a matter of detail. It does not go to the merits of the bill. That is, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] took issue with the report as to the number of trained men that were in the country; that is all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Therefore gentlemen voting for the bill, generally speaking, without regard to details or amendments, would be voting in accordance with the wishes of President Wilson with respect to this increase of the Army?

Mr. HAY. They would. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I, as one of the members of your Committee on Military Affairs, upon whom devolved the responsibility of framing this bill, the purpose of which is to increase the efficiency of the Army, am gratified by the interest which the membership, as a whole, seems to manifest in the bill, and the apparent unanimity with which it seems to be approved; and I am sure that I voice the sentiments of each member of the committee in expressing my appreciation of your approval.

When the hearings began on the bill, on January 6, the country was greatly disturbed over the question of a more adequate national defense, and there were many different shades of opinion among the members of the committee and the House, as a whole, as to the proper course to pursue in our efforts to strengthen the Military Establishment. The committee held hearings for 28 days, during which were presented the views of our greatest military experts in the Regular Army and National Guard, as well as every shade of opinion from the citizenry of the country, including those who were for and those who were opposed to an increase in the Army.

After the hearings were concluded the committee weighed carefully all the testimony presented, and have agreed upon the bill now before you. There were, of course, differences of opinion in the committee on many features of the bill, which is always the case on a great and important matter like this. But each member was willing to make reasonable concessions in order that an agreement might be reached, and we are all gratified that the bill which is the result of our efforts seems to be unanimously accepted by the House. We are also gratified that it has the approval of the President, and we trust and believe that it will receive the approval of the entire country.

Within the limited time that I have at my disposal this morning, I shall not attempt to discuss in detail the various provisions of the bill, for they have been so clearly explained by the chairman of our committee that I feel that every Member of the House understands the bill thoroughly by this time. I shall therefore direct my remarks toward the general principle upon which the bill was framed, and make answer to some of its opponents.

The question that is now before us has probably attracted more attention in Congress and in the country as a whole, than any other measure that has been before the country in recent years or probably since the foundation of the Government; and while we find many differences of opinion among the citizenry of the country upon the bill and upon the movement as a whole, I want to say first that there is one principle upon which we all agree. The great fundamental principle which underlies this bill and this Government, is the principle upon which the Congress and the American people will always agree. It is the first principle that finds lodgment in the heart of the child; it is the last principle that dies in the heart of man. It is the principle upon which our Republic rests, and without which it can not endure. That principle is the principle of self-preservation and self-defense. Every self-respecting citizen believes in defending himself against unjust attack, and believes in preserving his integrity and his honor, and will sacrifice everything he possesses to do so. And every patriotic American citizen believes in defending the Government and preserving its integrity and its honor, and will make any sacrifice to do so.

Every man upon the floor of this House, Mr. Chairman, would fight to protect that flag. Every man upon the floor of this House and every patriotic American citizen elsewhere would die, if need be, to preserve the honor and integrity of this Government. [Applause.] Therefore upon the great fundamental principle involved there is no difference of opinion among the American people. We do find, however, opposition to this bill and opposition to this movement. We find that opposition divided into four classes. That opposition is not due to the fact that some are unpatriotic and do not love the Government or reverence its flag, but because of the fact that we differ as to how to accomplish the end desired. Some oppose an increase in the national defense because of the cost involved and some oppose it for other reasons. We find among the opponents of this bill the self-nominated antimilitarists, who believe that a step toward a more adequate defense for the Nation would bring upon us the monarchical militarism that we see in the monarchies beyond the seas. But I want to say to those gentlemen that they fail to distinguish between a monarchy which gives its thought, its life, and its soul to its monarch and a republic which retains its thought to its individuals and the reins of its government in the hands of the people. [Applause.] Then we find opponent No. 2, the ultrapacifist, who seems to believe that the dove of peace is spreading its snow-white wings over this Republic and is about ready to furnish from its spotless plumage a pillow upon which the head of the Republic may rest throughout the future without a struggle or without a care. But I want to call the attention of those gentlemen to the fact that this Government was not established by our fathers without a struggle or without sacrifices, nor will it be maintained by us or our posterity without an effort or without a care. I find that some of these gentlemen, some of these peace-at-any-price advocates, are appealing to the churches of the country to assist them in their crusade against preparedness. I grant that they are honest in their opinions and sincere in their efforts. Their only trouble is their lack of a proper appreciation of the situation before us. Most of the letters that I have received against the movement—and they have been very few—have come from some good Christian people of my district, and God knows that I love them and respect their wishes, though forced to disagree with their judgment. Many of them believe that the efforts of those who are praying for peace will make peace secure and war impossible.

Mr. Chairman, I join them in their wishes and their prayers, but I do not wholly agree with their conclusions. Let me say in this connection that the greatest apostle of peace that the world has ever known, that man who preached peace in the zenith of His power and who practiced it in His walks and in His life, from the manger of Bethlehem to the cross of Calvary, failed to convince a sinful world of the purity of His doctrine. Pure as were His motives, noble as were His efforts, He failed to eradicate the spirit of avarice and greed from the hearts of men. Another thought to those who are attempting to array the religious institutions of the land against this movement is the fact that it is the arm of the law that makes it possible for congregations to assemble without interruption in their worship of God. [Applause.] Go into the criminal courts all over this country and we repeatedly hear from the calling of the dockets the charge of indictments of individuals for disturbing congregations assembled for public worship. What would be their condition if the mantle of protection which is thrown around them by the arm of the law, by the forces of organized Government, were taken from around them? It would be impossible within a few months for them to associate in that capacity in many communities throughout the country, for how often do we see the church forced to appeal to the police force for protection against the breakers of the law? If denied that protection, the churches would suffer, and moral and religious progress would be impeded, and, without the ennobling influences of the church, society would suffer. And so it is with the Nation. The men and women who pray for peace in the Nation do not pray more earnestly or more fervently than they pray for peace in their respective communities, and their prayers are no more effective. I believe that the prayers of the righteous have done much in the past and will do much in the future to prevent strife and to bring peace out of chaos. But there are cases that prayers will not reach, for there are men and nations who will not yield to their better impulses or heed the voice of reason; and so long as there are men and nations of that type and that character, just that long it will be necessary to deal with them through and by the forces and instrumentalities of organized Government.

Another argument advanced by the pacifist is that adequate national defense by our Nation will impede the progress of the movement toward international peace. They hope that the day will come in the immediate or remote future when the nations of the earth will agree to disarm and carry into execution that agreement, thereby saying to the world that war shall be no more. I join them in that hope, and pray that God may speed the day that it may be fully realized. But until that attainment is achieved, if it ever is, let America be prepared to take care of America first. And it is unreasonable to suppose that such preparation on our part would in any way impede the progress of an international peace agreement. On the contrary, it would make our position stronger and our influence greater in such a movement, for the nation adequately prepared to defend itself would have greater influence in its efforts to bring about such an agreement than would the weak nation that is at the mercy of the stronger nations.

Next is opponent No. 3. We find the alarmist who believes that preparation for a more adequate national defense will lead us into war. I want to say to the gentlemen of that type that if they hold to that doctrine they must contend that they will be safer in their homes with the locks off of their doors. They must admit that, if that doctrine is correct, it would be wise for their towns to discard their police courts and their police authorities. They must admit, if they hold to that doctrine, that society around them would be safer from attack on the part of the lawbreaker if they should discard the civil courts of their country and dismiss their officers. They must admit that it would be sound doctrine for their State to tear down its penitentiaries. The two propositions are on all fours, and they can not get away from it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I can not in the limited time I have, I regret to say.

Then we find another opponent of the proposition, opponent No. 4, the man who does not want to pay the price. Now, I believe that the majority of the people of this country believe that the best way to prevent war is to be prepared to defend ourselves in time of war. [Applause.] Nations are like men. A nation is not different from the individual units which compose it, and the individual who would strike a blow at his fellow man, as a rule, is not so apt to strike that blow if he believes the other fellow is prepared to defend himself. And so it is with nations. But for those who do not want to pay the price, let us compare war conditions with peace conditions. Take, for instance, the figures in the Civil War. I find that the excess cost of that war, in addition to the average annual cost of maintaining our military establishments at that time, was $3,075,345,727. To that we add the collossal sum for pensions for Civil War soldiers of $4,457,974,496 up to June 30, 1914, the latest figures I have, making the total excess cost of that war $7,533,320,223; and this does not include the interest which we have paid on the war debt. How far would that go in maintaining the present military establishment of our Government? Our present military establishment costs approximately $102,000,000 annually. Then the total cost of the Civil War, saying nothing of its destruction of business and wealth, saying nothing of the homes that it destroyed, the blood that it shed, the widows and orphans that it made, the cost and sorrow of which can never be estimated, would maintain our present military establishment for 69 years at the present cost of maintenance. So to you gentlemen who do not want to pay the price, let me insist that you had better consider carefully the cost of war before arriving at a definite conclusion upon this point, for the most expensive war in which a country can engage is the war for which it is least prepared.

Then, my friends, there are other propositions in connection with the cost. We are the greatest Nation on earth, with our commercial interests growing by leaps and bounds; a Nation of 100,000,000 energetic people, and with a boundary line around the mainland of the United States of 17,301 miles, 12,000 miles of which is coast line, upon which we have 189 ports through which we export annually from two billion to three billion dollars' worth of commodities produced by the American people. Our exports for the last calendar year amounted to $3,547,480,372. Suppose we should become involved with a hostile nation, and that some of our great bases of export should be seized because of our inability to defend them, and our commerce stopped on the seas because of our inability to protect it. What effect would that have upon this country? Why, it would instantly throw the country into the worst panic that it has ever experienced, affecting its every section; and panics are as expensive as wars from a standpoint of dollars and cents.

I heard a gentleman say the other day that he was not interested in the protection of the coasts of our country because he lived 300 miles from the coast. That gentleman fails to realize first, that this is a united country, and, second, that there go from his community every year, every month, and every week commodities into the markets of the world that bring back gold to his community. From the district which I represent we send to the markets across the seas lumber, staves, coal, iron, fire bricks, agricultural products, and live stock. We exported last year from the United States $50,962,517 worth of tobacco, much of which went from Kentucky, the banner tobacco State of the Union. It is therefore obvious that any condition that affects our export trade affects and injures every section of the country, and in addition to our interest in our ports through which go our exports, we are all interested in our coast cities, in which reside people who are our kin and kind, and in which we find domestic markets for our products. These cities could not be injured by a foreign enemy without the effect of such injury reaching the whole country; and this thought brings us to the question of paying tribute to an enemy nation to prevent the destruction of our coast cities in the event we should be unable to protect them against such an enemy. Suppose we should become involved on the Atlantic coast with Germany, England, France, Austria, or some other European Nation, and on the Pacific coast with Japan or Russia. Our Navy would probably be able to protect the more important cities along the Atlantic coast, but it is not strong enough to protect both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts at one and the same time. Some of our coast cities would therefore be open to attack, and an enemy fleet could level its guns upon them and demand a tribute of millions or billions of dollars from the city or the Government of the United States to save the city from destruction by the enemy's guns. Such methods have been followed in wars of the past, and resorted to by Germany against Belgium in the present war; and, my friends, in considering this phase of the question, I find in me none of the sentiments expressed by the gentleman who said that he was not interested in coast defense because he lived 300 miles from the coast.

I live 600 miles from the coast at the nearest point, but I am a citizen of the same Government and live under and honor the same flag as does the man who looks from the window of his own home upon the ocean's waves. I am a citizen of the same Government and live under the same flag as did our pioneer citizens who braved the dangers of the frontier settlements, and for whose protection the Government of the Union fought the Indians for a hundred years. We are one Union of citizenry from one end of the country to the other, and the chief reason for such a Union, the basic principles of the Federal Constitution, was to unite into one body of sufficient strength to protect each community of the country against foreign invasion or domestic insurrections. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, no citizen from any quarter of the United States can sit idly by and unconcerned and see another citizen or another section of his country suffer at the hands of a foreign enemy without violating the fundamental principles of the Constitution of the United States and repudiating his obligations as a citizen. We are one country and one citizenry, living under one and the same flag, and are each obligated to contribute to the protection and well-being of the other.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have said enough relative to the protection of our ports through which go our exports to foreign markets and our coast cities, in which reside American citizens, over which floats the American flag and in which we of the interior find markets for much of our produce and raw material, to convince everyone of the necessity of their protection. I will therefore pass on to that part of our coast territory which has no fortified harbors. On our 12,000 miles of coast line we have only 27 fortified ports or harbors. The remainder of that vast area is dependent, first, upon our Navy, and, second, upon our mobile Army for protection. And this thought brings us directly to the merits of this bill, the main purpose of which is to increase the strength of the mobile Army. If an enemy should attempt to land an Army on our shores at any point not within reach of one of the 27 fortified harbors, and should succeed in defeating our Navy, our last and only protection would be our Army. And is our Army, with its present strength, sufficient to defend us? Well, let us see if it is.

We have in the continental United States an Army of 49,000 men who would actually engage in battle. The remainder of our Army here at home are men of the Quartermaster's Corps and the Ordnance Department, which furnish supplies, and the Medical Corps, which administers to the sick and wounded. The remainder of our total Army is stationed about in our island possessions and in Panama. It has been argued in this Hall and from the stump throughout the country that our distance from probable and formidable enemies gives us absolute security against attack. But, Mr. Chairman, such an argument is fallacious, and one only has to refer to history to prove its fallacy. India and Transvaal were farther from England and Tonkin was farther from France than we are from either of them. But distance did not save those places from invasion and conquest. And it has been stated, too, that no nation could transport troops enough to give us trouble, even though she should be able to land them. Well, let us see. Both England and Germany have strong navies and strong merchant marines. By using 25 per cent of their merchant marine as an adjunct to their navy Germany could embark at one sailing 250,000 troops and England more than 1,000,000. Ah, Mr. Chairman, what would be the fate of our little Army and what would be the sufferings and agonies of our people if such an aggregation of troops as either England or Germany are capable of sending should be landed upon our shores?

It is very clear that our forces for defense are not commensurate with our responsibilities or equal to the forces which we might be forced to meet. Hence the necessity of an increase in our Army and Navy. Oh, some say that because we are not embroiled in the European conflict we need no further or greater defense. But let them stop and consider conditions sanely and calmly, and then pass judgment. Every great country on the globe except our own is engaged in it, and many of them have been drawn into it not because they wanted to go into it, but because unfortunate circumstances forced them into it. God knows that we do not want to be drawn into that horrible conflict and are praying as a Nation and as individuals that such a calamity may be averted. But, Mr. Chairman, no one can tell what may happen in a time like this, when the war spirit has set the world on fire and crazed the brain of nations. In a time like this men and nations can not at all times choose what course they will take or find their chosen course what they had expected it to be, because by the evil designs of another the course which seemed peaceful and safe may become turbulent and dangerous. Oh, yes; we read of such unfortunate and unpleasant experiences in the lives of both individuals and nations.

When the honest, peaceable citizen retires after a day's labor he expects, and has a right to expect, a night of peaceful rest; but yet, with his desire for rest and his good intentions to go peacefully about his honest pursuit on the morrow, the evil heart of the burglar may be designing plans by which to enter his home and take from him the fruits of his honest toil, and may make him his victim in poverty or death ere the rising of another sun. But, Mr. Chairman, if the burglar learned in advance that his would-be victim was armed for his self-defense and had the moral courage to use his weapons for defense he would most surely change his mind and stay his effort to carry into execution his wicked designs; and the same argument will apply to the belligerent forces of a nation. And, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that any people on earth know that better than we do right at this particular time. Only a few nights ago the peaceable, patriotic American citizens of the little city of Columbus, N. Mex., retired after their day's labor, expecting to go about their peaceful pursuits on the morrow. But what was the sequel? What their fate? Ah, Mr. Chairman, we know too well for our happiness or our comfort. Before the dawning of another day their homes were burned, their men were shot, their innocent women and children murdered by Mexican bandits from across the border; and, gentlemen, there are other people in other countries who are just as bitter toward us, and whose hearts and minds are just as highly inflamed against us as are the Mexicans who committed the dastardly crime to which I have referred. This condition exists not because of any wrong we have done but because of wrongs we have refused to do, or their wrongs to which we have refused to submit. [Applause.] Therefore, men, be not deceived. Your peace theories are beautiful, and I would that they could materialize into genuine realities and stand throughout the centuries as a monument to your noble desires and intentions. But listen; listen to this one suggestion. We all know, and are forced to admit, that there is nothing so dangerous to a theory as an adverse fact; and the fact is that your theories are not well founded and are insecure. Then, in the face of such facts, I appeal to you men of this Congress and this country to put America under a strong and secure lock, made of a strong and well-organized Army and Navy, that her peace and safety may be insured against the avarice, the greed, the burglary, and the enmity of all the world. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, from the opponents of preparedness comes the argument also that we will not have war unless we want war and invite it. But, gentlemen, I warn you against such a delusion. We do not want war, and have never wanted it. But during the 136 years that have elapsed since the birth of the Nation we have had eight wars, or an average of one war for every 17 years that the Government has existed; and in addition to the wars referred to, we had a century of almost continuous warfare with the Indians. We did not want or invite any of them, but fate forced them upon us. We met the issue, came out victorious, and glory in our victories; and we, of course, hope to come out victorious if ever forced into war again. Some contend that we should not make further preparation, because we are now better prepared than we were when we fought our wars of the past. That is true; but we must not lose sight of the fact that the other Nations with which we engaged, or with which we might be forced to engage in the future, are also better prepared than they were during our engagements, and we have more territory, more wealth, and more lives to protect now than we had in those days. The continual increasing cost and responsibilities of rearing a family are analogous to and parallel with the proposition of building and maintaining a Government. It costs the parent with six or eight children more to support his family than it did when he had only one, two, or three children. His responsibilities increase as his family increases; and so it is with a Government. And in line with that thought I desire to refer briefly to some complaints that have been made with regard to the amount of money that is spent on the Army of the United States as compared with the amount expended on the armies of other countries. It is true that it costs the United States more per man to support its Army than it costs other nations to support their armies, but it must be borne in mind that the cost of labor and the cost of living is greater in this than it is in other countries. It costs the Government of the United States more than it costs other countries to employ men for the Army, just as it costs the private employer of the United States more to employ labor than it costs the private employers of other countries. We pay our first-year enlisted men of the Regular Army 60 cents a day and feed and cloth them, and can hardly get them at that; and we increase the salaries of our officers in proportion to their rank, as do other countries.

Great Britain pays her enlisted men only 30 cents a day; Germany, 12⅝ cents; France, 6⅝ cents; Italy, 23½ cents; Russia, 1½ cents. As I have said, the cost of living in America is greater than in other countries, and it must be borne in mind that it costs just as much to feed, clothe, and shelter a soldier as it does to feed, clothe, and shelter a private citizen. Another heavy item of cost that we must meet because of the immense size of our country, and which amounts to but little in many of the other countries because of their limited territory, is the cost of transportation. If you consider the area of the United States, including Alaska, as 100 per cent, the combined areas of all the following countries are but 97 per cent thereof:

Austria-Hungary	6.66
Belgium	.31
British Isles	3.34
Denmark	.43
France	5.64
Greece	.69
Italy	3.06
Japan	4.46
Russia (in Europe)	57.95
Turkey (in Europe)	1.71

Neither Austria-Hungary, France, nor Germany is as large as Texas; each is about twice the size of Colorado. Japan is about the size of California, Italy of Nevada, and Portugal of Indiana; yet the peace strength of the armies of these countries is as follows:

	Men.

I do not contend that we need an army in proportion to these armies, in comparison with the differences in the size of their territory and ours, but I do contend that if we should become involved with any of these nations our trained force is entirely too small to cope with theirs.

Now, I have shown the immensity of our territory and the smallness of our means of defense as compared with the same means maintained by other countries, none of which is one-tenth as large as the United States, including Alaska. I think I have made my analysis plain enough to convince anyone that our means of defense do not measure up to our responsibilities. I do not mean by that reference that we could not get men to go to the front if the honor or security of the country should become involved. We could get a million men in a week, or get them overnight if the emergency were an extreme one. But that is not the question. There is science in both warfare and defense, just like there is in any other line of business. You would not expect to go to the farm and get a full force of clerks for a city bank or a city department store and have them run either successfully before they had had training. Nor would you expect to go into the offices in a city and get a crew of farm hands who had never seen a farm and expect them to take charge of and successfully harvest a crop. They would waste the crop and die themselves of sunstroke and other diseases brought on by their sudden change of conditions to which they were not seasoned; and so it is with an army. We have had one very notable experience of that kind in this country and more or less of it in every war that we have fought. But the one that I particularly refer to is the experience of the Civil War. Statistics of the War Department show that of the men who enlisted in the Civil War on both sides, two died of curable and largely preventable diseases for every one who died in battle or as a result of battle, and almost countless numbers were unnecessarily sacrificed in battle for lack of training of both officers and men. And, Mr. Chairman, I know of no greater crime that a nation can commit than to call to its defense its patriotic young men, the very flower of its manhood, and subject them to useless destruction both by disease and in battle because of their lack of training in the arts of defense and the science of health in army life; and it is to prevent a repetition of a national crime of that character, as well as to better insure the safety, progress, and well-being of the Nation, that I advocate a larger and more thoroughly trained Army. And at this point, Mr. Chairman, comes another thought in connection with the cost. The boys who go to defend the country go from American homes. For each one who enters the service there is a vacant chair at the family fireside and an aching heart in a mother's bosom; and shall we, the wealthiest Nation on earth, with our billions of wealth already developed and our countless billions yet to develop, make less favorable the chances of these brave young heroes to return to their fathers' firesides and their mothers' bosoms by economizing on the cost necessary to the preservation of their health in army service and their lives in battle should battle be forced upon them? Gentlemen, this thought appeals to me personally, for I have brothers and I have sons who may be called upon to defend the flag; and, if they should, I pray God that they may have every advantage and every protection that proper training can give them, even though it costs money to train them.

I referred awhile ago to the smallness of our Army as compared with our responsibilities in the continental United States, and in addition to the mainland of the United States we have island possessions with a total coast line of 9,926 miles. These islands are our territory, and must be protected by our Government; and to add to our responsibilities we have on our hands the Philippine Islands—which we ought never to have had and which I trust we may soon get rid of—but so long as the Stars and Stripes float in the Philippine breezes, that long we are bound to protect the Philippine territory. And then, Mr. Chairman, in addition to our responsibilities by reason of our own territory we have heavy and growing responsibilities in Central and South America, which have a coast line of more than 17,000 miles, because of the Monroe doctrine, which our Nation inaugurated and has maintained for more than 90 years. Under that doctrine we say that the Western Hemisphere shall continue to be the home of democracy and the abode of republics, and that her republics, from the strongest to the weakest, shall not be interfered with by the monarchies or other Governments across the seas. And, Mr. Chairman, this point brings me to another thought which we may well consider, and consider carefully, and that is this: The monarch of every monarchy, the king of every kingdom of the earth, is jealous of the spirit of democracy and republican governments and are praying for their annihilation. A monarchy endures by its monopoly of knowledge and its military force. A republic endures by the patriotism of its people and the dissemination of knowledge among them. The two principles are distinct and in conflict with each other, and that conflict has been going on, the two principles have been at war with each other, either on the battle field or in the hearts of men, from the overthrow of King Tarquin and the establishment of the Roman Republic 440 years before Christ up to the present day.

Therefore let us be not deceived. Let us not imagine that we are dwelling in a land of eternal peace, upon which no jealous eye will ever fall or against which no monarchical force will ever be directed. Such a thing may never happen, and, again, it may. We do not know. But there is one thing that we do know, and that is that some of the Empires of Europe have looked with an anxious eye upon South American territory, and no earlier than the year 1908 one of them attempted to hoist her flag and plant a colony of her people in South America, but withdrew at the request of the United States, made in compliance with our obligations under the Monroe doctrine. But the next effort, should it ever be made, might be more determined than was the last one, and should it be successful it would follow that the Government that was strong enough to enter by force upon South American territory would continue to grow stronger, would continue to acquire more territory, and would eventually absorb the small Republics of the entire South and Central American countries; and should that occur, which, I grant, is not probable but it is possible, especially in the absence of sufficient military and naval forces to prevent it, what condition would follow? Why, sirs, the day would come, probably not in our time, probably not in the near future, but it would eventually come when this Republic would have to combat on the soil of the Western Hemisphere and at its own door the powers of monarchical government in its efforts and struggle for world supremacy. I pray that that day may never come. I trust that neither we nor our posterity may ever be forced to meet such a condition, and the best way, my friends, to prevent its coming is to be prepared at all times to suppress and thwart the first effort; and we can only be prepared to do so by having an Army and a Navy of such magnitude as will convince any foreign power that its efforts to plant colonies or establish a government on the Western Hemisphere can not succeed; and by this method, and by this method alone, can we guarantee the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine. It is true that some of our American people criticize the Monroe doctrine and claim that its maintenance is not essential to the future peace and perpetuity of this Republic. But be that as it may, we hold to that doctrine, and, without discussing the wisdom or unwisdom of it as defined by different opinions, it is sufficient to say that so long as we as a Nation adhere to and maintain it, we must preserve our honor as a Nation by meeting the responsibilities which we thereby incur. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Chairman, this bill represents an awakening of the people of the United States to a realization of their dignity and responsibility as a Nation. It points the way to a new governmental policy. It rejects as unsound the assumption that we can depend for the protection of our interests upon the influence of moral suasion at a time when our border is invaded by armed soldiers bent on robbing and murdering unprotected women and children.

The theft by Mexican outlaws of American cavalry horses and Army artillery furnishes a chapter in our history which has no precedent and which should have no recurrence. And the inability of this Government, representing 100,000,000 persons, to cope with this Mexican band, without an act of Congress to increase the Military Establishment, leaves no room for discussion as to the humiliation and precariousness of our predicament.

We can no longer rest content in the assurance that all the world is our friend, and that we are not subject to the enmities and hostilities of which other peoples are victims.

The need of military and naval preparedness is being discussed and debated not only in Congress but at every fireside in every hamlet and village and city throughout the length and breadth of the land. A new era must be inaugurated. The question is not, Is it wise to create this new national policy? We have reached the point where its establishment is a stern and immediate necessity.

My concern is not whether we are entering upon a dangerous experiment, but whether we are going far enough to meet the actual situation which confronts us. We have seen the spoliation of China, because of the inability of that rich country to resist the intrusions of more powerful neighbors. We have seen that the policy of peaceful argument and solemn appeals to the justice and morality of the issues had no weight in saving the Chinese people from the loss of their prestige, the confiscation of their resources, and the threatened destruction of their nationalism.

We in the United States have grown to a position of prosperity and pride where envy will point her finger in our direction, and greed will invoke the hatred of otherwise kindly disposed peoples. It is our duty as a Nation to be ready for insidious encroachments on our territory or attempted interference with our commercial rights and industrial activities.

The time will come when we will have to announce in certain and unmistakable terms whether the Monroe doctrine is an American principle or an international tradition. The country looks to this Congress to act wisely and adequately. It is clearly our duty to establish a policy of preparedness which will give a feeling of genuine and justified security to the people; one which will provide a guaranty of continued liberty and independence to ourselves as well as to the generations that are to come. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back four minutes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. NICHOLLS]. [Applause.]

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, before taking up the argument on the bill in question I had decided, due to the limited time extended to each of us, to limit what I had to say to one phase of the bill, because it is impossible for a man to discuss 82 sections and discuss them to any extent. I shall therefore limit what I have to say to the question of the National Guard, which, in my judgment, is the most vital part of the new organization of the Army.

When I came to Washington as a new Member of Congress, I am frank to admit that I had in my head that there were two great lines that divided this body, that one was Republican and the other was Democratic, and that when any question of great interest came up the two lines divided and one was on the one side and one on the other. When I was appointed on the Committee on Military Affairs I was afraid that I was going to find that to be true. But what did I find? I found 21 men, some Republicans, some Democrats, but each forgetting that fact, and standing there as Americans to benefit this Nation by their action. [Applause.] That committee worked out this bill with no politics, no partisan lines, and has presented it to you with a unanimous front, and nothing could give the country and nothing could give me more delight than to see this House take the same action that that committee took.

We had several propositions before us. The first was, Shall we defend? We all agreed that we shall defend. And the question then arose, How is the best way to give adequate defense without being extravagant in that defense? The War College submitted a plan to create what was known as the continental army, and the plan which we have given you is the plan of the administration, except that we use the National Guard instead of the continental army. It is needless for me to go into a discussion as to why we did not favor the continental army plan. To put it briefly, we did not believe it was practicable. We did not believe men could leave their positions for one month in the year and serve their country, and go back and find those positions still open to them. We did not believe, even if they had the patriotism to do it, that the employers who employed them would allow them to come back and fill those positions, and, furthermore, we believed that the limited time given them in which to prepare themselves to be soldiers would virtually do them no good. Therefore the committee took the position that the National Guard, already working 52 days in the year, should be used as a second line of defense, and, if possible, add to that instruction the instruction given in the summer camps. And then we had the continental army plan coupled with the benefit derived from the National Guard. Therefore we substituted that plan for the plan of the continental army, which, I think we all agree, was not feasible.

And right here I want to state that the fact that Secretary Baker wrote a letter to this Congress disputing or controverting the figures presented by our chairman on yesterday should not bear on the merits of this bill. It is merely a question of an estimate as to how many reserves we have or how many men have been through military training.

It does not make any particular difference, but I want to call the attention of Congress to this fact, without meaning any reflection on the present Secretary of War: I want to ask you who prepared the letter that he sent, and how he knows, within the brief length of time that he has been here anything about the proposition? That thing came, in my judgment, from the War College, that has been opposed to our bill from start to finish, because they can not get exactly what they want.

Now, I want to say further that the plan which we give you is the plan of the President. We have given him everything that he has asked for, he having withdrawn his proposition of the continental army. There is no use in any of us denying that if we did have a large standing army of 500,000 or 600,000 men it would be a splendid way to defend the country, and the best way to defend the country would be to put a cannon on every rock on all our coasts and surround it with soldiers. But we can not do that. Let us do what we can do, and we can not do anything unless the people of the United States back us in what we do. Therefore the object was to get the next best thing. Your Regular Army, gentlemen, is sufficient, with the National Guard and the reserve corps, to defend you against an invasion. It has been said in the hearings before our committee that it would be impossible to land over 200,000 men in one trip from any foreign country, and if the standing army of 140,000 fighting men, besides the additional corps, can not attend to those 200,000 while that other country that we are supposing is going to attack us is going back to get more, then we ought to abolish the standing army. They can handle it and will handle it.

Now, let us see where the fighting forces of this country have always come from. You remember when the South tried to secede from the United States, and when the standing army, or the trained Army of the United States Government went to Bull Run to "wipe off the face of the earth" a mob of untrained citizens of the South; and you remember that the society people of the city of Washington in their carriages rode down to see the race; and you also remember that when those citizen troops met them there there was a race, and the people in the carriages headed the procession of runners back to Washington. [Laughter.]

Now, my friends, I am not trying to draw any sectional lines. I am as far from doing that as anybody in the House. The South did not have any standing army or any form of government to speak of, but they did have brave men ready to fight for the cause they believed to be right. The men who finally won that war were the citizen soldiers of the Northern and Western and Eastern States. When they repulsed our citizen soldiers at the Battle of Gettysburg they virtually ended the war and saved the Union; and this war was fought out by men who did not have compulsory military training when the war began.

Now, my friends, let me give you a little more history. When this Government was founded and when all the trained troops of our Government had been defeated, and when the British troops went toward the South, sweeping everything before them, and were in a position almost to conquer a free-minded, free-thinking, liberty-loving people, what took place? The citizen soldiers at Cowpens, in my own State, and at Kings Mountain, in North Carolina, without any military training, completely routed those troops and gave us our Government.

I have always believed that it takes two things to make a soldier. It takes not only discipline to make a soldier, but it takes patriotism; and the man who volunteers to give his time, to give his money, to give his blood, if necessary, in the service of his country in the National Guard, has, in my judgment, got more patriotism than the man who admits that he enlists to defend that flag for the paltry sum of $15 a month. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, will you pardon a personal illustration of National Guard duty? Five years ago in my native city a negro committed the unmentionable crime. He was placed in the county jail and a mob of 2,000 people attacked that jail with the intent of lynching him. The sheriff and his deputies shot some of that mob before the company was ordered out. The governor of that State wired the captain of the company and ordered him to defend that jail. I saw a National Guard company—18 of its members had worked side by side in a cotton mill with the young lady outraged—I saw that company respond, with two other companies of the National Guard, to the call and drive that mob from the jail walls, protect that negro, and never flinch and never flicker, although every member of those commands was in favor of stringing that negro up if he had not been under that oath to obey orders; and I tell you now in the South it was a harder thing for them to do than to face any cannon that the Kaiser has in his command. [Applause.] It was not a question, in that instance, of ordering men to fire and getting a response. It was a question of keeping them from firing on account of the insults hurled at them by that mob; and yet such discipline was maintained that not a shot was fired and the law was upheld. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, troops that can act thus under those conditions, troops who can act in the manner that this company acted there and in other places, can be relied upon to defend this country in time of war. What else? Another feature enters into the proposition of the national guardsman. While our standing Army, while our reserve, is defending our coasts against a probable invasion, while we are getting those troops to the front, you will have National Guard officers trainnig their companies. I think the committee was right in allowing the States to have some say-so as to who should command those troops. Suppose that a regiment goes out from Delaware. The men in the regiment know their officers. They have volunteered in the National Guard because they did know the officers and had confidence in them and wanted to be with them. Suppose my regiment comes out from South Carolina. Men are in that regiment who would not have joined it but for the fact that they liked the officers and had confidence in them. Suppose we put them in a joint encampment in time of war, and the President should say, "You Delaware officers command the South Carolina regiment, and you South Carolina officers command the Delaware regiment." What is going to happen? You can not get the same efficiency that you can get under your own officers. Therefore, I say the President will not under any conditions mix up things in that way.

No, gentlemen, I do not stand here and pretend to tell you that any National Guard organization is equal in efficiency to our standing Army. I do tell you, however, that if the border in New Mexico had recently been defended by a regiment of National Guards, and Villa and his bandits had crossed into the United States and burned the homes and destroyed the property of our citizens and the machine guns of National Guards had failed to work, and they had been caught asleep on the job, you would have heard a howl throughout this Nation denouncing them. I do not believe there is a regiment or battalion in the National Guard in this country who would not have acquitted themselves equally as well, if not better, than the United States troops stationed in Columbus, N. Mex.

There is another proposition that I think is of vital importance to the plan of defense, and that is the proposition that my friend from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] spoke of yesterday, about nitrates for the purpose of manufacturing powder. I do not care to discuss that further than to say that I do not believe any defense would be adequate if we could be cut off from supplies of the ingredients which are necessary for the manufacture of ammunition, because none of us would say that it would be proper to send our troops into the field with nothing to fight with.

Now, gentlemen, I have talked along this line as long as I care to. I want to say to you men above the Mason and Dixon line who are fighting the proposition of preparedness, and to you men below the Mason and Dixon line who are fighting the proposition of preparedness, that you remind me of the time when I was a boy and my mother wanted to give me a dose of medicine and I did not want to take it, and she said, "You have got to take it whether you want it or not; you don't know what is good for you." I want to tell you Members from the North who are opposed to preparedness that in 1860 those of us in the South tried our best to secede from the Union and those of you in the North kept us in the Union very much against our will. We are proud of the fact that you did, but we wish to assure you that we are just as much a part of the Union as you are and we are just as proud of this great Nation, and that we are going to give you protection whether you want it or not, because, evidently, some few men on the floor of the House do not know what is good for the country. This House will adopt the measures which are necessary to protect our country and defend the honor and glory of the greatest Nation under the sun. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the Committee on Military Affairs in reporting this bill to the House has provided the country with every possible facility in the way of putting our military organization on a sound foundation. In the first place the military critics and the citizen critics who have attacked our Army and our so-called lack of preparedness and who have charged that the country is in such imminent danger from invasion by a foreign foe have, in my opinion, vastly overshot the mark. Even some of the representatives of the War College and of the General Staff who appeared before the Military Committee differed so widely in their views and some of them so exaggerated the necessity of an immense standing army that they failed to inspire our committee with confidence in their recommendations.

On the other hand, the so-called pacifists have argued that no increase whatever is required. So the committee have taken a middle course. We have recommended only moderate increases, but those we have recommended will, in my opinion, place the country in a reasonable state of preparedness. Personally I believe the House should still further increase our Regular Establishment. A Regular Army of 180,000 would not be too large for this great country of 100,000,000 people.

Now, it is said that the appropriations that Congress has made in past years have been largely wasted and that we have no Army to-day. That statement is absolutely false, and our Army is the best army of its size in the world to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] made the statement yesterday that we had appropriated more money for the support of our Army than Germany has for hers in a certain length of time. I did not quite catch his statement as to the length of time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can not answer as to the correctness of any figures that may have been quoted. I hardly think we appropriate as much as Germany does for her army; but I want to say to the gentleman that we pay for our Army upon the American scale of wages. We have to compete with the civilian wage, in order to attract men from other walks in life; and if you take the amount of money which we are compelled to pay our men, if you take into consideration the way in which we subsist them and house them and all that, it shows that the money has not been extravagantly expended. But what I wanted to say was this, that considering the size of our Army there is no army in the world to-day that is at a higher standard than our own. Our officers are educated in as high a degree of military science as those of any army in the world. Under the system of Army service schools established 15 or 20 years ago, every officer in our service at some time in his life is put through a course of instruction which brings him absolutely up to date. Whether a Coast Artillery officer, a Cavalry officer, or an Infantry officer, he has access to the service schools of his particular branch, and the men who graduate from these schools are provided with the very latest ideas in military science, prevailing in any army of the world. All my life I have lived adjacent to one of the largest military posts in the country; and if you gentlemen could learn what I have learned by such proximity to our Army you would, by such daily observations, be inspired with confidence in the fighting capacity of the enlisted men, and confidence in the ability and intelligence in the officers that we have.

I do not believe we need a great Regular Establishment of half a million men as some advocate. I believe we only need men enough to garrison properly our outlying possessions, the Philippines, Panama, and Hawaii, and to provide what may be called an adequate coast defense, to properly garrison our own military posts and provide a proper internal police force for our own country.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the letter of Secretary Garrison, as well as in the explanation of the assignment of the troops under this bill, it is proposed to have but a portion of the increased enlisted Army in the continental United States and a large number dispatched for service in Hawaii, the Philippines, and the Canal Zone. What is the necessity for providing this increase for use in our insular possessions instead of having them confined to service in continental United States?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that I do not believe any of the increase provided for in this bill is intended to augment the garrisons in our outlying possessions.

Mr. STAFFORD. Secretary Garrison's outline suggested more than one-half of them for that purpose.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is my belief that most of the troops have already been taken from continental United States to Hawaii and Panama and the Philippines that are really demanded to garrison these places, and this increase will be used largely to replace those men in continental United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, the increase is more for strengthening our forces in our possessions, rather than our forces here, against foreign attack?

Mr. ANTHONY. We have already strengthened our forces in our foreign possessions, and the increase will go largely to take the place of those garrisons that have been taken from our interior posts and our Coast Artillery forces here at home.

Mr. STAFFORD. That accounts for the want of troops at present in continental United States to meet the conditions on the Mexican border.

Mr. ANTHONY. That accounts for it absolutely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The condition along the Delaware River is, that whereas our fortifications there would require normally 800 men, they have been reduced to 200. Is it not essential that along the great coast line there should be a stiffening up of the number of men required to man the defenses actually in our possession at the present time?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think under our present policy it is the intention of the department to place the increases in the Coast Artillery provided in this bill at those points from which they have been taken away to send to Panama and Hawaii.

I will say further to the gentleman that, in regard to the Coast Artillery, personally I was against any increase in the Coast Artillery, because I do not think there is the slightest necessity for any increase. It would be far better to provide that all the increase we provide go to enlarge our mobile army. I think so far the reason that, going back into history, you will find that we have not fired a coast-defense gun or used a coast-defense soldier for the last hundred years. If this country was invaded by a foreign foe they would not land within miles of our fortifications if they could get away from them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the Navy of the United States should break down, which God forbid, would not the coast line be the first line of defense?

Mr. ANTHONY. In my opinion, no foreign battleship would dare approach a fortified harbor of any of our big cities. For instance, New York and San Francisco are so strongly fortified that no foreign fleet would dare expose itself by a direct attack upon them. The European war has shown the inability of battleships to stand up against land defenses, as at the Dardanelles, and our defenses of our great harbors are much stronger than any coast defenses in European countries, so our experts tell us.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would be because we had sufficient men to man our fortifications, which we do not have now.

Mr. ANTHONY. Our need is to provide a mobile army to defend the long stretches of our immense coast line that is not defended by big guns.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman would not dispense with the existing coast defenses?

Mr. ANTHONY. I would not. They serve their place very well, but I would not provide many additional big coast-defense guns but would keep them up to date.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman would maintain the requirements as to matériel?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that would need more men?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if the experience in the world the last year or two does not suggest that what we need is an increase in field artillery for effective defense, rather than coast artillery?

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is quite correct.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I agree with the gentleman. I think, man for man, the Regular Army is equal to any people on earth; but does not the gentleman think that somebody must have literally or figuratively gone to sleep on his post a few days ago in Columbus?

Mr. ANTHONY. I would rather that the gentleman answer that question himself.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think the gentleman can get my view.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If a foreign foe proposed to send men into the United States they would come in at some port which, presumably, we have fortified. The gentleman would not permit our fortifications to be undermanned if it should be necessary to repel that kind of an invasion?

Mr. ANTHONY. I would not underman any of our important single coast defenses. Many unimportant coast-defense posts now have garrisons, where a few caretakers for the guns would suffice. But if a foreign army came to our shores they would not necessarily come to a harbor. It has been demonstrated that a landing can be made on any unprotected part of the coast.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think that is true, but I wanted to have the gentleman say whether or not it is not true at the present time that the coast defenses are undermanned.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I do not believe that is correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the report of the bureau.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say this: I believe it is not necessary to have a full complement of men behind every gun in the coast defense in time of peace, but only enough men there to take care of the guns, and especially is this all that is necessary at the unimportant places if at any time the country is threatened they could be instantly manned. The Coast Artillery will say that you should keep a large force there all the time to man the guns, but the infantryman will tell you that in a time of necessity they can provide the men in 30 days to augment the trained mechanical experts of the Coast Artillery, and so man the great guns. It is the business of the Coast Artillery to provide trained men to handle the big guns, but that highly skilled proportion necessary is only 25 per cent. The other 75 per cent of the force needed could be augmented or recruited from the other branches of the service in 30 days.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does this bill provide for an increase of the Coast Artillery?

Mr. ANTHONY. It provides for an increase of 52 companies—about 5,200 men. I voted for it against my best judgment, largely to gratify the desire of men situated like the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman did it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe this bill provides a reasonable increase in the Regular Army. It would be better, however, to still further increase some branches, particularly the Cavalry, which the bill does not increase at all. Sufficient extra officers, by which we can readily train a sufficient army of citizen soldiers are provided by the bill. In addition a federalized National Guard of 400,000 is provided so that the country can be adequately protected in any emergency.

It does not take two or three or four years to train soldiers to make a fighting man out of a citizen, in spite of what the so-called experts will tell you. I want to say to this House that, in my opinion, if the emergency which the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks of should arise, if our Navy should ever be swept from the seas—and I do not believe that such a disaster could ever overtake us, even were all the ships of all the other nations arrayed against us, at least it could not be accomplished without the lapse of months of time—I believe that within three months an army of well-trained citizen soldiers could be armed and equipped and made ready to defend the country in addition to the 165,000 Regulars we have provided and the 429,000 National Guardsmen that are provided for in this bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman's statement as to the increase in the number of officers and the uses to which they are to be put—does the gentleman think the present plan or plan contemplated by the board or by the committee for the increase of the officers and placing them on the retired list, is right?

I understand that now the Army rolls are loaded down with retired officers and that appropriations to the extent of $4,000,000 are necessary to pay the salaries of retired Army officers.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is quite right. There has been too much liberality exercised in retiring officers from the regular service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is my purpose to endeavor to secure an amendment to this bill which will require our present retired list to be overhauled, and those men who have been retired for disability who have since recovered and become physically able to be restored to duty, restored to duty which they are able to perform.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. The point brought out a moment ago, or the suggestion, raised one thought in my mind. The gentleman speaks of putting a million men in the field in three months. Have we the equipment for those men?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that we have 1,000,000 extra modern rifles made and in storage.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman's reformation of the retired list contemplate a changing of the retiring age?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; it contemplates remedying the abuses which have heretofore existed. For instance, one of the abuses, in my opinion, is that which would require an Army chaplain to ride a horse 90 miles in three days or go upon the retired list. There are good men able to perform adequate military duty, for instance, able to sit in a swivel chair at the War Department and do good desk duty who have been placed on the retired list because they could not ride 90 miles in three days.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that that makes way for promotion?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, I readily understand that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not want the impression to go out that we have sufficient guns, not rifles, but field guns and ammunition and other necessary matériel to equip a million men?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I do not.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman's answer seemed to indicate that, and, of course, that is, unfortunately, very far from the fact.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that I think sufficient provision has been made and the manufacture of field guns has commenced in such substantial quantities that it will be comparatively few years until we have such supplies.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not believe that we can make an efficient Field or Coast Artillery soldier in three months so that he is able to shoot guns with the accuracy that would be necessary not to tremendously waste ammunition?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not at all. What I said was that we could augment the Coast Artillery from other branches of the service.

Mr. SHERLEY. Where are you going to get the men? The gentleman made the statement, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], about not needing men to man all the guns, that we only need part of a gun crew. Is that opinion shared by any officer in connection with the service?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; every Coast Artillery man will want every man you can give him.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is one thing to brush aside, as the small personal ambition of a man, his opinion, but it is another thing to meet the opinion of officers whose business it is to know. I have given seven years of pretty constant study to the question of Coast Artillery. I do not think the gentleman's statement touching the needs of the personnel is warranted by the opinion of those who have to deal with the question.

Mr. ANTHONY. When we get to that part in the bill I will give the gentleman my views.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman has already given his views to the House, and I did not want the statement to go unchallenged.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is not perfect in all its provisions by any means, but its general principles are correct. There are a number of places, however, which this House should straighten out before it is enacted into law. One of them is the inequalities which will result in promotion, which will follow from the increases we have made in this bill unless some provision is made to correct them. For instance, we increase the Infantry and the Coast Artillery and the Field Artillery, but we do not increase the Cavalry. Every Cavalry officer will suffer from seeing his brothers in the service promoted over his head while he marks time unless we provide that he shall advance at the same time they do, when the cause is purely legislative, as this is. From the thousand extra officers provided in the bill, if they are properly apportioned among the proper ranks and branches, we can make up for these inequalities. The present provision in the bill does not do this, but I believe the chairman of the committee is convinced there should be further liberality in that regard. When we reach that provision in the bill it is my intention to offer an amendment which will straighten out the present lack of equality there. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen speaking in favor of the bill on both sides of the House have mainly said that it is a bill for an increase of the Army sufficient in time of peace. That may be correct. I am not familiar enough with the subject to know, but it seems to me that the statement itself shows that the bill falls far short of what ought to be provided at this time. We are having a little trouble down on the border of Mexico, sending a few soldiers over into Mexican territory.

When the time came to do that, after having troops on the border for four years in contemplation of the possibility of the very thing that has occurred, no troops were really ordered across the border until the House had passed a resolution authorizing an increase of 20,000 in the Regular Army, to take the place, perchance, of the few soldiers who did cross the border. There never was a more pat illustration of the fact that while the present Army or the proposed increase may be sufficient in time of actual peace, it is not sufficient now when any occasion arises for even miniature war. [Applause.]

We are having the greatest war of all the ages going on now, with the determination on each side to kill the other side at all hazard, each side probably believing that it is fighting for its own existence, and fighting, too, with a revengeful determination to make the other side powerless in the future. In such a war neither side will be too careful of the interests of outsiders. We constitute the greatest neutral power in the world. We expect to speak with some authority. Who would pay in this war much attention to the suggestion or the request of one of the small Central American Republics? Would either England or Germany give very much attention to a protest made by even so good a Republic as Nicaragua? Not at all. Why not? They do not have either the actual or the potential power behind them. Our suggestions meet with careful contemplation, if not consideration, because of the actual or rather the potential power behind them. And we will not go through this war to the end without many questions arising of the greatest importance to us and to the world, and very largely it will be left to this Nation and the representations made by this Nation to protect the integrity of neutrals throughout the world, if not to maintain the principles of international law most vital to us and to the rest of the world. [Applause.]

Our influence, moral as it is, tremendous as it is from the moral side, is great not so much because of the reasoning which we adopt as the potential power behind that reasoning. Other nations and other men may reason as well as any of us, but they have not the power behind them. After this war is concluded, or after peace shall have been agreed upon, there will arise many problems perplexing in character, intricate in detail, and delicate in all of their relations. We expect that the United States of America will do its share toward protecting the interests not only of our people but of all the world and of all civilization. No one can tell what those questions will be or how they will arise. I believe that it is the duty of the United States, with the war going on in Europe, with its intricate and delicate problems constantly arising, with the questions that are sure to arise after the war, to prepare now an army which will add to the weight of the reasons and the suggestions which we may make. [Applause.]

We add by this bill only 20,000 to the Regular Army over what is now authorized; 40,000 before the resolution passed a few days ago. I have never been—I am not now—in favor of a large standing army. I do not believe it will ever be possible in a country like ours, with the feeling which our people have, ever to maintain either a large standing army or compulsory military service. [Applause.] But I do believe that an emergency exists where it is wiser and cheaper in the end to make ample preparation now for trouble which may come. If the trouble does not come, we will be getting off cheaply with the money which we expend. If the trouble does come, we will show that we will then be getting off cheaply both in money and in blood. The President of the United States, it is said on this floor this morning, favors this bill. Doubtless the President, who has indicated publicly his desires that there should be some real preparedness, favors the best he can obtain. I have no doubt he favors this bill over the existing law. I have no doubt he favors the Senate bill over the existing law. But this is not preparation for trouble; this is only preparation for peace. [Applause.]

If we do not fear trouble, there is no special hurry about this bill. If we fear that a dangerous situation may arise, then we are not preparing for it. I have noticed all through my life that the lawyer who prepares for his case in advance has the advantage. I have often noticed in this House that a man who prepares upon a subject has the advantage, and I have often noticed that the man who did not prepare was at a disadvantage. To me the time has come in the relation of our country to the world when I think it is wise for us to consider the possibilities as well as the probabilities and to prepare now for what may or might come to us, and if we do not do that and something does happen we will all, as well as the country, regret it to the end of our lives. With the war spirit running throughout the world, with the inflammatory feeling arising apparently among all the people, in this the greatest and richest Nation of the world, it were idle to say that we should leave ourselves utterly unprepared for possible war in the sublime confidence that God will take care of us as he does of drunken men. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair tell me how much time remains for this side?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield that hour to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, for years on this floor I have advocated the cause of preparedness. For years the suggestion fell upon deaf ears. It required a great war—a world war—to arouse the people of the United States to the necessity of enacting legislation for military and naval preparedness. No nation is the sole arbiter of its own destinies. The people of the United States are a peace-loving people; they do not desire war; they hope that war may never come. But suppose some other nation should feel that we have insulted its national honor—that we have affronted the people of that nation. Suppose that other nation should feel that the affront can only be wiped out by the arbitrament of arms. The American people are not cowards, but if challenged in that way they will fight [applause] even as they have fought in the past. But we can not fight unless we have the money, the men, the arms, and the munitions. And it is in time of peace that we must provide those means for defense. Wars come suddenly. I heard Lady Barlow deliver an interesting address here in the city of Washington a few weeks ago in which she described how suddenly the present conflagration in Europe was ignited. Her husband is a member of the English Parliament; her brother is a member of the English Parliament; her father is a member of the English Parliament. She had been appointed a delegate to a conference to be held at Constance, in Germany, on the 1st of August, 1914. On the 27th day of July preceding she asked her husband to speak to Earl Grey, the British minister of foreign affairs, and find out whether it would be advisable for her to go to Constance, she being a delegate to a convention that was to be held there on that day. War had been declared a day or two before between Austria and Servia. That evening her people had a conference with Earl Grey. The latter reported that there was absolutely nothing to fear—that there was not a cloud on the horizon that could not be dissipated through the forces of diplomacy. The next day—on the 28th of July—she started for Constance, in Germany.

She reached that city on August 1 in time to attend the conference, and while it was in session one of the secretaries rushed in excitedly and stated that war had just been declared between Germany and Russia; that the German Government had placed a special train at the disposal of the delegates; that mobilization had commenced; that unless the delegates took advantage of going on this train it would probably be a long time before they could reach their respective homes. The lady left Constance that afternoon. She arrived in London on the evening of the 4th of August. Two hours after her arrival war was declared between England and Germany. All of this occurred within the period of one week.

Take the war between Japan and Russia; that war broke out without warning to Russia. The war between Japan and China broke out without warning to China. And we may as well make up our minds that no nation on earth which should contemplate hostilities with us is going to give us time for preparation when that other nation believes that the hour has come when it must strike. So I repeat that we must make our preparations for national defense during the piping times of peace.

Oh, we often hear it said on the floor and elsewhere that 70 per cent of all the money that goes into the Treasury of the United States is expended on account of wars past and possible wars to come. If we had been prepared in our past wars we would not be paying that enormous sum for those wars. Take the pensions that are paid annually, approximately $165,000,000. Much of that money is paid because our men were stricken with disease; because they died of wounds that might have been healed but for our lack of preparedness——

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield just now. I will a little later on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. KAHN. Much of the money is being expended in paying interest on the bonds that it became necessary to issue by reason of our being involved in war.

Take the case of England in that regard. Her expenses in this war, according to the statements of her statesmen, aggregate $25,000,000 a day. Since the outbreak of this war she has expended $10,000,000,000 for the war. Take the case of France. She is expending approximately $17,000,000 a day. She has expended approximately $7,000,000,000 since the outbreak of this war.

Only yesterday, during general debate on this bill, a gentleman stated on this floor that if war should come the American people would gladly instruct their Representatives to vote the necessary funds to carry on the war. I do not doubt the correctness of the facts contained in that statement; I do not question it. Of course, they will do it. But just think of how much more it will cost in those days of stress to get ready to fight, and how much cheaper it can be done here during the days of peace. That is why we are paying so much for wars past. We had to pay war prices for everything we purchased in war times. It would have been infinitely cheaper to have purchased supplies in times of peace and kept them in reserve.

When the French Parliament was opened only a few weeks ago the oldest member of the body, Senator Latappy, who was the presiding officer of the Senate, stated that the trouble with France had been that her Parliament had been occupying its time too much with trying to cure all the ills of humanity and had not given enough time to the national defense. He stated further that if France had been as well prepared at the beginning of hostilities as she is prepared now, the probabilities were that she never would have been attacked. And I for one feel that if my country is properly prepared the chances of war will materially diminish. [Applause.]

It is the old case of the highwayman. He lurks behind a tree waiting for a victim. If he sees a vigorous, stalwart individual who can take care of himself come up the road, he lets him pass by in peace. But if he sees an individual whom he believes he can worst and rob, he pounces upon the latter and takes away from him whatever of value he happens to have in his pockets. It is the same with nations as it is with individuals. And our ultrapacifists make a great mistake in believing that mankind have grown to be so good, so generous, and so gentle that no people will want to fight us, and, if they do, all we need do is to hand them a Sunday school tract and that will settle the whole controversy. [Laughter.]

Preparation, not only against war but for every condition in which human life is concerned, is necessary in every country. Take the case of the man who puts up a magnificent apartment house. He feels it incumbent to add necessary fire escapes. They do not add to the beauty of the building, and they add materially to the cost of construction. If you were to ask the owner of the building, "When do you expect a fire?" he would promptly reply, "I do not know; but I am putting up these fire escapes to protect the lives of the people within the building in case fire should come." What is that but preparedness? A gentleman on this floor said yesterday that in the committee he had asked whom we were preparing against. He asked, "Is it Japan?" "Is it Germany?" "Is it England?" "What country are we to prepare against?" And he said he was surprised because none of the Army officers who appeared before us could answer the question.

Mr. Chairman, the captain of the palatial steamer that puts out across the ocean carries with him a large number of life preservers and lifeboats and life rafts. If you were to ask that captain, "When do you expect the storm in which you will be required to use these devices?" he would undoubtedly tell you, "I do not know. I hope no such storm will ever come; but if it should come I want to be prepared to meet it." [Applause.] And the same principle holds good with respect to the military and naval defenses of our country.

Mr. FIELDS. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. FIELDS. Has it not been stated on the floor of this House in the last two years by Members opposing preparedness that there was no possibility of war between the great nations of the earth at that time?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; it was so stated, and yet war did break out, and it broke out as suddenly as I stated a few moments ago.

It has frequently been asserted that the report from the Committee on Military Affairs is a unanimous one. It is. Preparedness, the question of national defense, is not and never should be made a partisan question. [Applause.] Every loyal, patriotic American citizen should want to see his country in a condition of preparedness for national defense, so that she would be able to properly defend herself, her citizens, and her institutions against the armed attack of any country on the face of the globe. [Applause.]

I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that we ought at this time enlarge our regular standing army.

But, after all, when you get a committee of 21 members together, each with his own views, his own ideas, it becomes necessary in the interest of good legislation, in the interest of speedy legislation, to yield some of one's personal views for the sake of getting other things that one might think are of equal importance. In other words, if the committee can agree on principles, the details can generally be reached by compromise. That is what happened in the committee.

The committee was greatly at sea upon the question as to how many additional men should be added to the Regular Army, and that was not strange. The committee is composed of laymen. They know little or nothing about military matters. Some few of the members have had service in the National Guard. Two or three of them had service of some kind or other in the Spanish-American War. But the overwhelming majority of the membership of the committee have had no personal experience in military matters, and therefore they had to depend upon the testimony given by those who are at the head of the Military Establishment of the Government. And what happened?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KAHN. In a moment. There were Army officers who came before us who testified that in order to be properly prepared we required as many as a million men. There were others who said that we needed immediately 500,000 men in the Regular Army. There were others still who said we needed 250,000 men in the Regular Army; and, finally, the Secretary of War said that about 134,000 men of the Regular Army would be enough, provided he had some other forces which he desired.

When you consider that the experts, the men who ought to know, are thus divided among themselves as to just what force is required you can readily see that even a great committee of the House of Representatives might make a mistake in fixing the proper figure for the number of men who should be enlisted for the line of the Regular Army of the United States.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. First, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Confirming what the gentleman says as to taking advice from those who know, does the gentleman recall the passage by this House, by an overwhelming majority, about two and a half years ago of the so-called Hensley resolution, which, upon a mere newspaper report from Great Britain, proposed that we should cease the construction of battleships for at least one year?

Mr. KAHN. I recall that incident.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. KAHN. But, then, it is a good thing for the country that there are men in Congress who have the courage to take the testimony that is given them, to weigh it thoroughly, and then, in the light of their judgment, to frame the legislation in all honesty in the hope that the country will approve. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And take advice from those who know.

Mr. KAHN. Sometimes they have to disregard the advice of those who are supposed to know, because, as I told the gentleman from Pennsylvania, those who ought to know how many enlisted men we ought to have in our fighting force varied in their figures from 134,000 to approximately a million men.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BORLAND. Before the gentleman gets away from the question of the increase in the standing Army, was it not also true that the committee was confronted with the difficulty that the Army now experiences in keeping the Army enlisted up to its present strength in time of peace? Would not a largely increased paid standing Army largely increase that difficulty in time of peace?

Mr. KAHN. Well, the testimony before the committee was to this effect—that during periods of business depression enlistments increased. So that enlistments increased considerably soon after the passage of the Underwood tariff bill. [Laughter on the Republican side.] But later on the enlistments—and it is so at present—fell off very materially.

Mr. BORLAND. In 1907 there must have been an enormous enlistment, a tremendous enlistment.

Mr. KAHN. There was not as much as there has been more recently. But in all seriousness——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would ask the gentleman to state the minimum number of men that appeared to be required, as the concensus of opinion of the experts who appeared before the committee.

Mr. KAHN. Well, as I now recall, the War College wanted 250,000 men. The Secretary of War wanted 134,000 men, and, as I say, the Army officers that appeared before us all differed from each other in their estimates.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. KAHN. I yield.

Mr. DECKER. I would like to ask the gentleman one question, to prevent what otherwise might be a misunderstanding. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asked the gentleman from California if he did not remember a resolution in which it was proposed that this country cease armament. Do you know of any such resolution as that introduced here?

Mr. KAHN. I recall something of that kind in the press of the country at that time, but whether it was ever introduced or not I do not recall.

Mr. DECKER. Was not that resolution introduced by Mr. HENSLEY to the effect that an effort be made by this country to induce all countries to cease military preparations for a year?

Mr. KAHN. I think that was done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Including the United States.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DECKER. And all the House voted for it except Mr. Moore.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is almost right.

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. KAHN. Now, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs discussed on yesterday the enlistment period in the United States Army. At the present time, under the existing law, men are enlisted in the line for a period of four years with the colors and three years in the reserves. I have always contended, and I feel now, that that enlistment period is too long. I think the chairman omitted to state the one important fact that would indicate a three-year enlistment period as desirable under existing conditions, and that is that we must send large numbers of our troops to our insular possessions. If we enlist those troops for a period of two years, we would begin training them on the day they left the mainland, and they would be about fully trained at the time they got ready to come home. For that reason it may be desirable to continue the three-year period for troops in service in our possessions at any rate. The bill provides for that length of service. But at the proper time I shall offer an amendment—and I think such an amendment might well be adopted—to allow any man in the Army, after a period of one year, if he can show proficiency as a soldier, upon the recommendation of his commanding officer to go into the reserves forthwith. (Applause.) And at two years he certainly ought to be allowed to go, even if his commanding officer is not willing to give him a certificate. I believe that a four-year period of enlistment or a three-year period of enlistment deter many young men from going into the Army—young men who would, for a brief period, be willing to adopt the life of a soldier for the experience and training it would give them during a period of one year, or even two years. Army officers have stated before the committee that you can not make a good, dependable soldier in less than three or four years. I think that is absurd. Take the great war that is being fought in Europe to-day; the soldiers in the German Army have had only two years' training. The soldiers in the French Army had two years' experience until a very few years ago, when it became necessary to increase the enlistment period in France to three years, not because the soldiers were not properly trained at the end of two years, but because the German population had so far outgrown the French population that Germany, with a two-year enlistment period, could put as many soldiers in the field as France with a three-year period of enlistment. That was the only reason for it. And if in two years you can make a good soldier out of a German boy or a French boy, or a Russian boy or a Japanese boy, I say you can make as good a soldier, if not an infinitely better soldier, out of an American boy in that period of two years. [Applause.]

I recognize the fact that if the period is cut down you must still make some provision for noncommissioned officers. You must allow a certain number of men to reenlist time and again for the purpose of making noncommissioned officers. They are all-important in any fighting arm of the military service.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal about compulsory military service, or universal military training. I have often said that, in my judgment, the people of the United States are not ready for such a program at this time; but I have as an exhibit here a number of English posters. They are genuine. Hundreds of thousands of similar posters, printed at an enormous expense of money, were distributed at considerable cost from one end of the British Isles to the other. For 18 months the Government of England appealed to the manhood of the land to come to the colors in defense of their King, their country, and their homes. It seems to me that in some of these posters one can read tragedies that seemingly ought to appeal to the latent patriotism of even the dullest of English citizens. For 18 months this effort was made. It would seem, however, that the effort was practically fruitless. Finally that country had to resort to conscription—to the draft.

In the one great war in which the American people were embroiled, the War between the States, the southern government resorted to conscription in 1862. The northern government resorted to it in 1863. For a while in the North we had trouble, even under the draft, to get soldiers, just as England to-day under conscription is having her difficulties to get soldiers. It may be that the time will come when in this country a system somewhat similar to the Swiss or the Australian system may be adopted. But each of those systems is predicated upon the idea of universal military training; and, after all, in a Republic like ours, that is the democratic, the fair, the honest way of getting soldiers. [Applause.] Every boy, whether he be rich or poor, whether his station be high or low, whether he come from the powerful or the weak, is put upon an exact equality with every other boy, and that is true democracy. [Applause.] Those who speak of universal training in these days can point with pride to some of the fathers of the Republic in that regard. Thomas Jefferson himself, acknowledged to have been the greatest of all Democrats, as early as 1805 prepared with his own hands a bill which he sent to his Secretary of War, Gen. Dearborn, with a request that the Secretary have it introduced in Congress and written upon the statute books, advocating compulsory military service. So those who believe in compulsory service have at least high authority for their views.

The trouble with us in this country to-day upon the question of preparedness seems to be this: We have on one side men who go to one extreme, and on the other side citizens who go to the other extreme. Both extremists do much harm and no good. I remember occasions on this floor when a gentleman, who is now absent from the House, rose repeatedly and urged that an enormous Navy be built forthwith because we would have war with a certain country, which he named, inside of two years. The two years have long since passed. We have had no war, and we may never have any war. At any rate, we all hope so.

But I believe that it is much more important to the people of the United States to-day that we build up without delay a large effective Navy than that we have an enormous Army. [Applause.] The Navy is our first line of defense. [Applause.] So long as we control the sea, so long as our battleships keep afloat to fight off any possible fleet that may be sent to our shores by an enemy, so long will our country be safe from invasion. It is only if we lose control of the sea that the invader would try to make a landing upon our coasts. And the testimony before the committee is to the effect that our military force must be so effective that if the invader should land he ought to be defeated at the seaboard. Therein alone lies the safety and the security of the people of the United States.

The ultrapacifists who came before our committee have lost sight of some of the elemental facts in life. In nature we find the birds of the air preying upon one another; the fish in the sea preying upon one another; the animals of the forest and the plain preying upon one another; the crawling insects and the creeping insects preying upon one another; and in all history in like manner men have preyed upon their fellow men. And you will have to change human nature to make it different. So long as ambition and avarice and covetousness exist in the human breast so long, in my judgment, will you have war. Nor can racial differences be adjusted in courts of arbitration, and so long as you have racial differences you will have wars. But, after all, the greatest, the most prolific cause of war is commercial rivalry; that is, in a measure, avarice and covetousness. Many nations of the world have been wiped out simply because some more powerful body of people wanted to get the trade that the weaker nation had built up. And many of the wars of our day were frequently brought about on account of commercial rivalry.

Mr. Chairman, the people of this country have grave problems to confront, perhaps graver problems than we have ever had to confront at any period of our country's history. We stand for the Monroe doctrine. Do you not think that that fact brings in its train a great burden to the people of the United States, especially so since we have built the Panama Canal? Can the people of the United States look with equanimity upon any other nation acquiring a naval base or territory between the Panama Canal and the mainland of the United States? I do not think so. And if we desire to keep other nations out we must be prepared to defend the Monroe doctrine, if need be, by force of arms. [Applause.] What is the use of trying to deceive ourselves? In the Pacific Ocean we have island possessions that are the key to the canal. Hawaii, in the north Pacific, and Tutuila, with our naval base of Pago Pago, in the south Pacific, are essential to the peace and the welfare of the American people. These insular possessions must be held by us, and in order to hold them we must have an augmented Army and we must have a powerful Navy. Let us not deceive ourselves in these matters.

We have, in the Far Northwest, Alaska, rich in minerals, rich in furs, rich in many other things; Alaska would be a great prize for any nation that might seek to try conclusions with us. Even there in that distant area we must be prepared to defend our rights.

I do not believe that the American people have been fooled with the statement so frequently made that the munition makers are responsible for wars; that it is they who incite the people to war. Long before there were ammunition makers, long before there was the so-called Ammunition Trust, since the earliest days of recorded history there have been wars; when each man had to make his own weapons—the bow and arrow—we had wars. There was no mention of a trust in those days. And, after all, for the last four years the Government of the United States itself has been manufacturing practically all of the ammunition which it requires for its Army.

Why should the ammunition makers, under these conditions, attempt to stir up war in this country? They have little or nothing to gain if the Government is making its own ammunition for its own Army. Yet we hear it constantly asserted, constantly repeated, that if the Government would begin to manufacture its own ammunition the Ammunition Trust would not be in a position to compel this country to get into war. The truth of the matter is the people do not know that we have been making our own ammunition for our Army during the last four years. It is about time that the press of the country should inform them to that effect.

Mr. Chairman, the bill that has been reported makes some splendid changes in the military organization.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield before he enters upon that?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I want to ask what the gentleman's opinion is in reference to the Monroe doctrine; what his opinion is, if he has one, of the effect of what has taken place at Brazil on the possibility of trouble over the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. KAHN. The dispatches in the newspapers seem to indicate that there might be an agreement between Germany and Brazil under the terms of which Brazil is using the interned ships on account of the scarcity of other ships to carry her products to the markets of the world. Of course, it is all conjecture. We know nothing about it, and until we know all the facts I for one do not want to indulge in the realm of theory. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] stated yesterday that, in round numbers, since 1901, this Nation had appropriated for the support of the Military Establishment $1,700,000,000; that during the same period the expenditure of the German Empire for the same purpose was $1,650,000,000, or practically the same amount. With this money the German Nation has armed a nation, built a military establishment which is the wonder of the world.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, that is largely due to the fact that our Army is the most expensive army in the world. We pay our private soldiers on the first enlistment $15 a month. My information was that the German soldier receives approximately 2 cents a day, or 50 cents a month, but the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] yesterday stated that the Germans get 12 cents a day.

Mr. FARR. The German soldier gets $38.52 a year.

Mr. KAHN. Thirty-eight dollars and fifty-two cents a year, while the American soldier gets in the way of pay $180 a year, besides many allowances that the German soldier does not get.

Mr. REAVIS. If the gentleman will pardon me, the statement made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] was that during war times the German soldier got 12 cents.

Mr. KAHN. My information is that the German soldiers in times of peace receive 2 cents a day. I imagine that information is correct, because in the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut he stated the figures for Austria, where they get 2¾ cents a day.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It may be that the gentleman from Kentucky doubts the figures that I gave because they came from a Democratic source.

Mr. POWERS. Oh, no, I do not doubt the figures at all, but I was wondering why we were not in a better state of preparedness.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I took the figures from the splendid speech of our colleague from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the speech he first made on the preparedness question before the House, and I have no doubt that the figures are correct.

Mr. KAHN. I do not doubt the correctness of the figures, but the reason is that we pay substantial wages to our soldiers and the other countries do not.

Mr. FARR. Do we really know how much Germany has spent on her army?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know. I can not furnish the information, but I am willing to take the information given by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Can the gentleman tell what part of the seventeen hundred million dollars has been spent for pay of the enlisted men?

Mr. KAHN. No. The last bill carried approximately $22,000,000 for their pay. We retire enlisted men after 30 years' service on three-quarters pay. The last bill carried $2,800,000 for that. Of course, in addition to that, the clothing allowance for soldiers is very much greater than in any other country, and the soldier gets other emoluments not given to the soldiers of any other country.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is it not a fact that the wages of the enlisted men represent less than one-fifth of the expense that has been spoken of?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; the gentleman is entirely mistaken. Now, Mr. Chairman, one of the things I like in this bill is the practical reorganization——

Mr. HENSLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I am sorry, but my time is running. If I have time, I will yield to the gentleman after I finish this. The new organizations will have a headquarters company, a supply company, and machine-gun companies. We have all learned from the war in Europe that the fighting there is being done in the trenches with machine guns. In fact, two or three days ago a gentleman who has just returned from the trenches told me that on the German side there is a machine gun about every 10 feet. If that statement be true, then we will have to increase largely the number of our machine guns, and I hope that the Ordnance Department will see its way clear to ask for proper appropriations for the construction of these most effective guns, so that in case war should come we will at least have a proportion of them that will be adequate for the defense of the American people.

Mr. Chairman, I have not that sanguine feeling about the militia that some of my colleagues have. I do not think it possible under this bill to enlist 425,000 national guardsmen unless many of the States of the Union change either their constitutions or their laws. The State of Utah, for instance, has a provision in its law that the possible limit of its enlisted men shall be twelve hundred. Under the Hay bill, at 800 men for every congressional district and 800 for each Senator, there should be thirty-two hundred men in the State of Utah. There will be a deficiency of 2,000 men unless Utah changes its laws.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman does not deny that under the Constitution of the United States the Congress has the right to fix the number of men which may be raised in any State?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, I think that is true, but I still believe that unless the States of the American Union meet this provision in this law in the same spirit in which it is being enacted by the Congress of the United States you never will have 425,000 men in the National Guard of this country.

I believe that under this bill we can get an effective force of about 250,000 men from this source. It will be a much better force than we have ever had from the militia of the various States, and, in my judgment, it will be worth the expense that will be added to the Military Establishment for this purpose.

I have great faith in the so-called summer camps. I believe that for a minimum cost we will be able to train a high class of American citizens in a comparatively short period of time to come to the defense of the Republic in case they should be called. These young men who attend these camps pay their own expenses. They are imbued with the true spirit of patriotism and a desire to serve their country. I believe they should be encouraged, and I believe that the provision in this bill in regard to these camps should be enacted into law. I believe that for a small fraction of the cost that was contemplated under the continental-army scheme we will get as good a class of men for about one-seventh of what the other force would have cost us. I believe that under this bill we will have in readiness approximately five or six hundred thousand men who will be ready to take up the defense of the country in case the President should call the armies of the country into being. I think that is the best that can be hoped for under the bill, but that is so much better than anything that we ever had before that I welcome the change, because I believe it is a right step in the preparedness of my country.

Mr. Chairman, in advocating preparedness, in supporting preparedness legislation, as I do, I simply want to avoid the mistakes of the past. If ever our battle flags must again be unfurled, if ever martial drumbeats shall again call our people to war, I want my country, once in her history, to be ready, ready, ready. And now is the time to get her ready. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, during a very long service here and after having made a great many speeches, I can truthfully say that I never spoke in this House under a more thorough and solemn sense of responsibility than I do this minute. As a preface to the remarks that I am going to make I desire to repeat one remark that I made in a short speech when the naval cadet bill was under consideration; that is, that I believe that if we attend to our own business we will never have another war. [Applause.] We have forced every war that we have ever had, and what is a good deal more to the point, we won in them all. While I can make this speech, and no doubt a better one, absolutely without notes, the Speaker of the House of Representatives can not afford to take any chances on slips of the tongue or on making rash statements or on being misrepresented, intentionally or unintentionally, because, to a very large extent, what he says will be taken as the views of the House. Therefore these notes:

Mr. Chairman HAY and his Committee on Military Affairs deserve the cordial thanks not only of the House but of the whole country for bringing in a bill so sensible, so comprehensive, and so satisfactory to reasonable men. [Applause.] The most pleasing and important feature of their action is that they did it by unanimous vote of that great committee, Democrats and Republicans working together in a brotherly and patriotic spirit. This is another illustration of a theory I have long maintained—that when there is any great question up in this House nearly affecting the honor, glory, or safety of the Republic politics has no place here. [Applause.] On such momentous occasions we are all plain Americans, intent upon doing our duty—our whole duty to our country and our kind. It would be well not only for our own citizens but for all the nations of the earth to make a note of that pregnant fact, thereby avoiding trouble. I am fain to believe that this bill will pass the House with the same unanimity with which it was reported from the Military Committee. A stranger sitting in the gallery yesterday or to-day, looking down on the House, could not have told Democrats from Republicans, except for the fact that by immemorial usage Democrats sit on the right of the Speaker and Republicans on the left.

That committee, happily ignoring the extremists at both ends of the line, have brought in a bill representing to a remarkable degree the wishes of our countrymen generally. Of course it was not in the power of Mr. Chairman HAY and Mr. KAHN and their fellow laborers to please everybody. No human power could do that. Even if King Solomon, with his wondrous headpiece, if he could return to us, could not do that. Here and there will be found one, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], for instance, who does not think this bill goes far enough, and one like my friend from New York [Mr. LONDON], who thinks it goes too far; but the average American will indorse it, and after all is said and done the average American constitutes the strength and glory of the Republic. I will not discuss in detail the provisions of this bill. That has been done by the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, who know more about the subject than I do—men of ability and integrity, who have devoted years of hard labor and painstaking study to the Army and matters pertaining thereto. I have faith in these men and I cheerfully accept their conclusions. They have done the best thing possible under all the circumstances, and it would be presumptuous in me to undertake to tinker with their handiwork.

The duty of Congress, not only now but always, is to transmute the will of the American people into law, and notwithstanding the senseless and malicious abuse heaped upon the Congress, that is precisely what it does invariably when it can ascertain with a reasonable approximation what the will of the people is.

That is exactly what the House is trying to do at the present time, and those impatient folks who have been criticizing Congress for going too slow in this matter have no conception whatever of the toil, thought, and investigation which the members of the Committee on Military Affairs have expended on this measure.

It so happens that since the agitation for and against what is popularly termed "preparedness" became acute and widespread I have spoken or lectured in 31 States and have tried to find out public opinion by reading magazines and newspapers, by experiments in my speeches and lectures on many audiences, and by interrogating every sort of citizen—section bosses, firemen, engineers, conductors, farmers, merchants, lawyers, preachers, newspaper folks, statesmen, soldiers, teachers, and laborers.

There are certain fundamental propositions on which the vast majority of the American people are agreed:

First. They want peace, but not "peace at any price." [Applause.] They want "peace with honor," the sort of peace that Benjamin Disraeli, the most brilliant Englishman since Lord Byron, boasted that he took home with him from the congress of Berlin—"peace with honor." While peace is the normal condition of Americans, and while they love it most fondly and pray for it most devoutly, they believe thoroughly that there are things worth fighting for—a belief which they have demonstrated with guns in their hands on all proper occasions. They are sure, if needs be, to do so again. They believe that the Revolutionary War and the War of 1812 were on our part just wars—necessary wars. Among their proudest and most cherished memories are Lexington, Bunker Hill, Trenton, Kings Mountain, Yorktown, the River Thames, and New Orleans. [Applause.] They remember with honest pride that in 1898 we went to war, not for self-aggrandizement, not for self-enrichment, but to free an alien people—our neighbor and our friend—from the clutches of an intolerable despotism; and when the war ended and we were conquerors we set up the people whom we had freed in housekeeping for themselves and returned into our own country. The historian of the times in which we live will write upon his glowing page with iron pen the verdict that on our part that war was the most splendidly altruistic performance in all the hoary registers of time. [Applause.]

Second. They do not intend to see this country turned into an armed camp. They are unalterably opposed, always have been, and forever will be until the Republic is on its last legs, to a large standing army; because, while we have never had a big standing army here, they know full well that in other countries huge standing armies have been the instruments of despotism.

Third. They are not willing to bankrupt the country in military and naval preparations. They are, however, willing to spend all that is necessary for the public defense.

Fourth. They are almost to a man against conscription in times of peace, but they are for it should it become necessary in times of war. For in war, as in other undertakings, having put their hands to the plow, they do not look back.

Fifth. While proud of the record of our small Regular Army in all our wars, they have always depended upon our Volunteers to do most of our fighting, and they glory in the valor of our Volunteers on hundreds of historic fields.

Sixth. They have no desire or ambition to have our country pose as a great military power, and they have no intention of seeing it as helpless as China. They know beyond a peradventure that a great, rich country without the means of defense is a constant temptation to the cupidity of mankind. They understand perfectly that we are the richest people on the globe or that ever was on the globe—possessing more than a third, almost half, the wealth of the entire world—and they do not intend to be despoiled of their rights or their property by any foreign country whatsoever. These hard-headed Americans believe profoundly in the philosophy that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." They are against a war of aggression, but they will fly to arms any day in a war for defense. They do not covet their neighbors' lands, and they do not intend that a foreign foe shall set foot on the sacred soil of the American Republic. [Applause.]

They know that the Navy constitutes the first line of defense and that it has proved a very present help in every time of trouble. They know that coast fortifications constitute the second line of defense and that observation of the stupendous war across the sea proves that battleships can not batter down well-constructed land defenses. They know that Regulars, with such other troops as we can put into the field, constitute our third and last line of defense.

Seventh. In view of all these facts, beliefs, observations, and desires, the average American is in favor of reasonable and adequate preparation by land and sea—not for the purpose of attacking any nation on earth, for he believes with Thomas Jefferson in "peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations; entangling alliances with none"—what he wants with reasonable and adequate armaments by land and sea is to repel attack of any and every nation under the sun, should any nation be so unwise as to attack us. While he is not eager to pay taxes, he is willing to foot the bills for reasonable and adequate preparedness. He will consider the Hay bill reasonable and adequate for our land forces.

A great many people—I am not talking about foreigners now, but about our own citizens—a great many people here at home sadly misjudge our national character. We are constantly told that this is the most peaceable Nation beneath the stars. That is true, and we are all glad of it, proud of it; but that is only half the truth, and a witness is sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. The whole truth is, that while we are the most peaceable Nation in the world, we are at the same time the most martial. The proof of that seeming paradox is that in April, 1861, there were not 20,000 soldiers in America, while in April, 1865, the continent trembled beneath the iron heel of 2,000,000 of the finest soldiers the sun ever looked down upon, some in blue and some in gray. [Applause.] At the first tap of the drum an entire people sprang to arms and went to death as to a festival. So it will be again should the occasion come, which God forbid! We were 30,000,000 strong then; we number 100,000,000 now.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this bill sets out in particularity what we ought to do. I suggested some time ago, in the speech to which I referred about the naval cadets, that there were a few things that could be done with the maximum of good and the minimum of cost; and one of them has already been done, namely, increasing the number of cadets at Annapolis. When this bill is passed most of the things that I suggested at that time will have been accomplished and we will be on the high road to having a well-drilled and well-officered National Guard or volunteer force that we can increase from time to time, according to the exigencies of the situation. I believe in practicing what we preach. In 1800 less than 5 per cent of the American people lived in cities and towns, and in 1910 more than 46 per cent of the American people lived in incorporated towns of over 2,500 inhabitants. By reason of the changed conditions our children are not having certain advantages which the children of the olden times had.

In his book on "Destruction and Reconstruction," the most classical book ever written concerning the Civil War, Gen. Dick Taylor says that after the Battle of Front Royal they found 30 or 40 Federal cavalrymen dead on their horses, and who could not fall off because they had great leather belts around their waists which were attached to rings in their saddles. What good is that sort of cavalry? One reason why the Confederates got such a bulge in the early part of the Civil War was because the southern men generally were used to handling firearms and to horseback riding.

We are forgetting the art of shooting in this country. We are forgetting the art of horseback riding. When my son became old enough to hold up a shotgun I bought him the best gun I could find and taught him to shoot it. As soon as he got big enough I bought him the best target pistol I could find and taught him to shoot it. I taught him how to saddle and ride and curry and feed a horse. I wish every boy in the United States could ride like an Indian and shoot the way the Squirrel Hunters of Kentucky and Tennessee did on the 8th day of January, 1815, on the great and glorious field of Chalmette.

There are a whole lot of things we can do. These military schools all over the country have waked up at last and are trying to put their curriculums high enough to guarantee their top graduates as lieutenants in the Army if they ever get a chance.

We boast of our vast wealth and of our inexhaustible physical resources. I like to think about it myself. But these things do not make a mighty nation. Long, long ago Sir William Jones propounded a far-reaching and immortal question and answered it himself:

What constitutes a state?
Not high-raised battlement or labored mound,
Thick wall or moated gate;
Not cities proud with spires and turrets crowned,
Not bays and broad-armed ports
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starred and spangled courts
Where low-browed baseness wafts perfume to pride.
No! Men—high-minded men—men who their duties know,
But know their rights and knowing, dare maintain—
These constitute a state!

[Loud applause.]

I am happy in the belief that that sort of men constitute not only the House of Representatives but the vast bulk of American citizens everywhere. [Loud and long-continued applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask whether the reading of the bill is by section or by paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. By paragraph.

Mr. HAY. I think the rule is to read it by section. It is not an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is mistaken. The Clerk will read the bill by sections.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That each regiment of Cavalry shall consist of 1 colonel, 1 lieutenant colonel, 3 majors, 16 captains, 16 first lieutenants, 16 second lieutenants, the veterinary officers hereinafter authorized, 1 headquarters troop, 1 supply troop, 1 machine-gun troop, and 12 troops of Cavalry organized into 3 squadrons of 4 troops each. Of the officers herein provided, except supply officers, the first lieutenants not required for duty with the troops of Cavalry or with headquarter, supply, or machine-gun troops shall be available for detail as squadron adjutants or such other details as may be lawful.

Each Cavalry headquarters troop shall consist of 1 captain who shall be the regimental adjutant, 1 regimental sergeant major, 3 squadron sergeants major, 1 first sergeant who shall be the drum major, 2 color sergeants, 1 mess sergeant, 1 supply sergeant, 1 stable sergeant, 2 sergeants, 5 corporals, 2 cooks, 2 horseshoers, 1 saddler, 23 privates, 1 band leader, 1 assistant band leader, 1 sergeant trumpeter, 2 band sergeants, 4 band corporals, 2 musicians, first class; 4 musicians, second class; 13 musicians, third class; 1 sergeant orderly, and 11 orderlies.

Each Cavalry supply troop shall consist of 2 captains, who shall be regimental supply officers; 1 first lieutenant and 2 second lieutenants, who shall be squadron supply officers; 2 regimental supply sergeants, 3 squadron supply sergeants, and such noncommissioned officers and other enlisted men as the Secretary of War may authorize to be supplied from the Quartermaster Corps and other staff corps or departments: Provided, That the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the supply troop, supplied from the regiment and the Quartermaster Corps, shall, when in garrison, be available at all times to assist the quartermaster thereof.

Each Cavalry machine-gun troop shall consist of 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, 2 second lieutenants, 1 first sergeant, 1 mess sergeant, 1 supply sergeant, 1 stable sergeant, 8 sergeants, 8 corporals, 2 cooks, 2 horseshoers, 1 saddler, 1 mechanic, 2 trumpeters, and 62 privates, of whom not to exceed 25 per cent shall be rated as private, first class.

The commissioned officers required in each regiment of Cavalry for headquarters, supply, and machine-gun troops, and for the troops organized into squadrons shall be assigned from among the officers hereinbefore authorized for the regiment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill provides increases in the Regular Army of the United States of all branches of the service except the Cavalry. No increase is provided in the Cavalry regiments of the standing army. The number of Cavalry regiments now provided for the Regular Army is 15, and the present strength 14,220 men. This present strength is capable of being increased to a war footing of 20,700 men. In addition to this there are among the Organized Militia of the National Guard of the United States 97 troops of Cavalry, whose present strength is about 5,000 men. The greater part of this Cavalry strength among the Organized Militia is in the Eastern States.

It is stated by members of the Military Affairs Committee that one reason why no increase in the Cavalry of the standing Army is provided is that encouragement is to be given to the organization of Cavalry troops and regiments in the enlarged National Guards. While the great fighting strength of any nation, especially under conditions of modern warfare, must be its Infantry, and while it is true also that the Field Artillery and the Coast Artillery are very necessary to any plan of defense of our own Nation, yet the time has not arrived when any great war can be conducted or any adequate defense made against invasion without a sufficient supply of Cavalry. Cavalry is the great mobile force, the flying wing, of every army. Its services are first called into action. It performs the most difficult, daring, and arduous tasks. Great generals and military geniuses of all times have relied for the success of their battle plans upon the use of their Cavalry.

I understand that the present estimates for military expenditures in behalf of the Organized Militia provide for furnishing the militia cavalry organizations with horses. Such organizations are now furnished by the Federal Government with all their necessary equipment, including caretakers and veterinarians. To my mind there is no section of the country so well adapted to the organization of cavalry in the militia as the Western States. It is a branch of the service which utilizes to the highest degree the peculiar training, dash, and abilities of the western farmer, pioneer, and frontiersman. The quota of Organized Militia contemplated in the present enlarged plan, so far as it applies to the Western States, can very largely be supplied by mounted troops under the proper encouragement of the Federal Government. In the western counties of Missouri alone an entire regiment of cavalry of the Organized Militia can readily be recruited if proper provision is made. This branch of the service will prove of infinite value in case of danger, because it can be readily assembled and thrown quickly into the locality where needed.

When war between the United States and Mexico was declared in April, 1846, Gen. Kearney, in command at Fort Leavenworth, was given authority by the War Department to raise two mounted regiments for service in Mexico. Both regiments were raised with wonderful promptness in the counties of western Missouri, then sparsely settled and on the very frontier of American civilization. The first to respond was the celebrated First Missouri Cavalry, under the famous Col. Alexander W. Doniphan. With this regiment Gen. Kearney began his march overland down the Santa Fe Trail to New Mexico. He was furnished with no supplies, no reserve force, and was practically without orders or plan of campaign. Before the middle of August all of New Mexico and Arizona were in the possession of the American troops and a new and orderly government had been established. The century-long conflict between the Spaniards and the Indians had been suppressed and Kearney was ready to proceed to the pacification of California. By this time the Second Mounted Regiment of Missourians arrived, under Col. Sterling Price, and Col. Doniphan's regiment moved on into the heart of Mexico and took part in the successful engagements which followed below the Rio Grande. These regiments illustrated the very highest type of the citizen soldiery. They embraced within their ranks many young men who afterwards rose to national fame. The most striking thing about their organization was the promptness with which they were assembled and the speed and effectiveness with which they operated. The Texas Rangers are another historic example of the effectiveness of mounted organization. We shall do well to provide in the great plan of national defense in which we are now engaged effective means for utilizing one of the highest and best forms of the organization of citizen soldiery. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 2, line 17, after the word "officers," to insert the words "in time of peace."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 17, after the word "officers," insert the words "in time of peace."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. On page 3, line 8, there are two captains provided for the supply troop. May I ask the gentleman the need of two captains in the supply troop?

Mr. HAY. Because I am informed by the Quartermaster Department that they would not have enough officers to take care of the quartermaster's duties in the regiment unless they do have this extra captain.

Mr. KAHN. Then, if they have the extra captain, why should they have the first lieutenant? I am told that the first lieutenant should be available as a battalion adjutant.

Mr. HAY. Well, that may be true; but the idea in providing these officers was to give a large number of officers to a regiment for the purpose of discharging the duties of these extra troops, and it is to give leeway for officers off on detail without materially injuring the organization, and the gentleman knows the fundamental idea is to get as many officers as you can conveniently carry. I think that is the idea.

Mr. KAHN. On page 4, line 5, I move to strike out the word "trumpeters" and insert the word "buglers."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 5, strike out the word "trumpeters" and insert in lieu thereof the word "buglers."

Mr. KAHN. That is the technical term now used in the Army for these men. They no longer use the word "trumpeter," but use instead the word "bugler."

Mr. HAY. It is a question of whether the word "trumpeter" is used in existing law, because if it is, when we consider the pay section after making a new class, we have to provide for them there.

Mr. KAHN. I have not looked up that feature.

Mr. HAY. I think they were called "trumpeters" in the act of 1901.

Mr. KAHN. They are now called "buglers."

Mr. HAY. I suggest to the gentleman that he do not forget, when we come to the section which provides for the pay, to offer an amendment.

Mr. KAHN. I will do that.

Mr. HAY. I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 1 for a question which I wish to ask of the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALLAWAY. On page 1, beginning at the end of line 6, is this language:

When in the judgment of the President war becomes imminent all of said organizations that shall then be below the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law shall be raised forthwith to that strength and shall be maintained as nearly as possible thereat so long as war, or the imminence of war, shall continue.

If I understand the general provisions of the bill, there are skeleton organizations formed that would allow the Army to be expanded to 270,000 men.

Mr. HAY. Two hundred and seven thousand.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes; and under this provision the President is given authority to expand the Army to that number at any time he should consider war imminent, without awaiting the action of Congress. I think the Constitution of the United States has very wisely provided that the President can not declare war. I think that reservation ought to be kept with Congress, and it occurs to me that if our war strength is to be considered 207,000, we ought not to give the President this power, which will virtually enable him to make the whole preparation which is reserved by Congress. Mr. Chairman, what was the reason for the committee giving the President that power not contemplated by the Constitution?

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that in every bill that provides for the raising of troops for the purpose of war that has been the provision contained in this bill, from the early times down to the present, for the reason, as I conceive, that conditions might arise which would make it very apparent to the President that war was certain. It might happen that Congress was not in session at the time, and therefore it is thought wise to allow the President, when he believes that war is imminent, to take these precautionary steps and not to wait until Congress actually declares war. Otherwise the country that might be intending to make war upon us would catch us unawares.

I do not believe that this power conferred upon the President has ever been abused, nor do I believe that it ever will be abused. I do not think that any President would undertake ta raise this Army to war strength unless he was thoroughly convinced that war was imminent; and then, too, Congress would have in its hands the power to refuse to make the appropriations for those men if the President had not wisely or had unpatriotically called them into existence when they actually were not needed.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, would it not become practically the duty of Congress to appropriate for the pay and expenses of men if the President had been given the power to call them out, and it had been done in a legal way, according to the provisions of Congress?

Mr. HAY. I think the Congress would do it if it turned out that the President had acted without cause and because he had, for some purpose of his own, determined to raise the Army to war strength and not for the purpose of defending the country.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, if it is wise to give the President this power to make the preparation for war, would it not be wise also, because we might be caught unawares, to give him the power to declare war?

Mr. HAY. Oh, no. That is a very different proposition. In the first place, we could not do it, because the Constitution provides that the Congress must declare war.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I understand that.

Mr. HAY. And therefore we have no power in an act of Congress to provide that he shall declare war.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I am not talking about our authority. I am talking about the wisdom of the thing. If it is wise for Congress to retain the power to declare war, it occurs to me that it would be wise also to retain in Congress this power to make war provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may be allowed to proceed for five minutes if he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. As I said before, this power has never been abused. It has been carried in every bill of this character that has ever been passed by Congress, and it is simply a precautionary measure, and nothing more. I can not conceive of any man who is President of the United States so far abusing his power or so far flying in the face, as it were, of the people of the country as to build up an Army when there was no actual need for it. I thfnk that the long line of precedents justifies us in carrying this provision.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the chairman of the committee answer this question?

Mr. HAY. I will if I can.

Mr. SLOAN. How long has the language referred to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] and by the gentleman from Virginia been in the law relating to the organization of the Army?

Mr. HAY. I can not say to the gentleman just how long it has been there, but I say that in all bills, like the Volunteer Army bill, for example, passed two years ago, and in all bills looking to preparation, those are the words used. In the Army bill of 1901 they were not used. I do not know why.

Mr. SLOAN. Were they used before that? Is this a matter of modern innovation or otherwise?

Mr. HAY. It has been in every bill that was ever passed by Congress.

Mr. SLOAN. That goes back how far?

Mr. HAY. To the beginning of the Government.

Mr. SLOAN. I can well see that the President would be the best judge of the imminence of war against us, but I can not see, of course, how he would be the proper person to determine whether we would engage in an aggressive war.

Mr. HAY. This language does not provide for anything of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Field Artillery shall consist of 12 colonels, 12 lieutenant colonels, 36 majors, 192 captains, 24 of whom shall be supply officers, 192 first lieutenants, 24 of whom shall be supply officers, 228 second lieutenants, 12 of whom shall be supply officers, the veterinary officers hereinafter authorized; 12 regimental sergeants major, 24 regimental supply sergeants, 36 battalion sergeants major, 36 battalion supply sergeants, 24 color sergeants, 12 mess sergeants, 12 supply sergeants, 12 stable sergeants, 24 sergeants, 192 corporals, 24 horseshoers, 12 saddlers, 24 mechanics, 48 trumpeters, 36 cooks, 288 privates, 120 orderlies; 12 bands, each of which shall consist of one band leader, 1 first sergeant, who shall be the drum major, 1 assistant band leader, 1 sergeant trumpeter, 2 band sergeants, 4 band corporals, 1 cook, 2 musicians, first class; 4 musicians, second class; 13 musicians, third class; 108 batteries, each of which shall consist of 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, 2 second lieutenants, 1 first sergeant, 1 supply sergeant, 1 mess sergeant, 1 stable sergeant, 1 chief mechanic, 5 sergeants, 12 corporals, 4 mechanics, 3 cooks, 2 trumpeters, and 102 privates, and such other enlisted men as the Secretary of War may authorize to be supplied from the staff corps or departments. The commissioned officers required for said batteries shall be assigned thereto from among the officers authorized by this section for the Field Artillery at large. The remaining officers and all the enlisted men so authorized shall be assigned to duties or organized, within the Field Artillery, as the President shall from time to time direct: Provided, That the President in his discretion may increase the number of sergeants in any battery of Field Artillery to 7, the number of corporals to 16, the number of mechanics to 7, the number of trumpeters to 3, and the number of privates to 149: Provided further, That each battery of Field Artillery shall be armed and equipped, and any two or more of such batteries may be combined into or detached from higher tactical units as the President shall from time to time direct: Provided further, That the supply officers and supply enlisted men provided for by this section shall when in garrison be available at all times to assist the quartermaster thereof: Provided further, That in construing existing law relative to the appointment of chaplains in the Army nine batteries of Field Artillery shall be regarded as a regiment thereof: And provided further, That for the purpose of lessening as much as possible inequalities of promotion due to the increase in the number of officers of the line of the Army under the provisions of this act any vacancies created or caused by this act in commissioned grades below that of captain in any arm of said line may, in the discretion of the President and under such regulations as he may prescribe in furtherance of the purpose stated in this proviso, be filled by the promotion or transfer without promotion of officers of other branches of the line of the Army; but no such promotion or transfer shall be made in the case of any officer unless it shall have been recommended by an examining board composed of five officers not below the rank of captain of the arm to which the promotion or transfer of such officer shall have been proposed, who, after having made a personal examination of such officer and of his official record, shall have reported him qualified for service in said arm in the grade to which his promotion or transfer shall have been proposed.

In the emergency of actual or imminent war the President is authorized to organize 1 ammunition battalion for each organization of Field Artillery consisting of not less than 6 batteries, and 1 artillery park. Each ammuntion battalion shall consist of 1 major, 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, who shall be the supply officer, 1 ammunition battalion headquarter detachment, and 3 ammunition batteries.

Each ammunition battalion headquarter detachment shall consist of 1 battalion sergeant major, 1 battalion supply sergeant, 4 corporals, 1 trumpeter, 2 cooks, 3 orderlies, 3 privates, and such noncommissioned officers and other enlisted men as the Secretary of War may authorize to be supplied from the Quartermaster Corps and other staff corps or departments.

Each ammunition battery shall consist of 1 captain, 2 first lieutenants, 2 second lieutenants, 1 first sergeant, 1 supply sergeant, 1 stable sergeant, 1 mess sergeant, 7 sergeants, 12 corporals, 1 chief mechanic, 1 saddler, 4 horseshoers, 3 cooks, 3 trumpeters, and not more than 187 privates: Provided, That not to exceed 25 per cent of said privates shall be rated as privates, first class: Provided further, That the President may, in his discretion, increase to 6 the number of horseshoers in each ammunition battery serving with mountain artillery.

The organization of an artillery park shall be as the President may prescribe.

The organization of ammunition battalions, ammunition batteries, and the artillery park shall be temporary, and upon the passing of the emergency requiring their creation they shall be disbanded. The officers necessary for said organizations shall be supplied by the assignment of officers from the officers' reserve corps hereinafter provided for, or by temporary promotions and appointments in the manner authorized by section 8 of an act to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war, approved April 25, 1914, for filling temporary vacancies created in the commissionel personnel of the Regular Army through appointments of officers thereof to higher volunteer rank.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, on page 5, line 7, I move to strike out the word "trumpeter" and insert "bugler."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 2, strike out the word "trumpeters" and insert the word "buglers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, on page 8, lines 9 and 10, I read that—

The organization of an artillery park shall be as the President may prescribe.

I think some of us laymen would like to hear something about that from some one in authority.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman from Nebraska that is intended for use in time of war. The President is simply given the authority to organize an artillery park as he may see fit. It is a war proposition.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Quite a number of Members have asked what is an artillery park. May I ask the chairman of the committee kindly to explain?

Mr. HAY. As I understand, an artillery park is a place where the guns, the caissons, the ammunition, and the ammunition wagons are parked for some purposes; but perhaps my friend from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], who has been a military man, can give a better explanation of it than I can.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. As I understand it, the parking of artillery is its assembling for repair purposes, and so forth, in emergencies in connection with the field service. In a different sense the words also mean a complete train of cannon, including equipment, ammunition, gunners, and so forth, for an army in the field.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Coast Artillery Corps shall, in addition to the commissioned officers now allowed by law, consist of 5 colonels, 5 lieutenant colonels, 14 majors, 68 captains, 68 first lieutenants, 68 second lieutenants, 25 sergeants major with the rank, pay, and allowances of regimental sergeants major of Infantry; 34 master electricians, 76 engineers, 89 electrician sergeants, first class; 89 electrician sergeants, second class; 54 sergeants major with the rank, pay, and allowances of battalion sergeants major of Infantry; 50 master gunners, 66 firemen, 222 first sergeants, 222 supply sergeants, 1,776 sergeants, 2,664 corporals, 444 cooks, 444 mechanics, 444 trumpeters, 17,982 privates, and 18 bands, each of which shall consist of 1 first sergeant, who shall be the drum major, 1 band leader, 1 assistant band leader, 2 band sergeants, 4 band corporals, 1 cook, 2 musicians first class; 4 musicians, second class; and 13 musicians, third class: Provided, That, within the limits fixed by law, the number of officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates assigned to the manning body of any particular tactical unit of the Coast Artillery Corps may be fixed by the President in accordance with the requirements of the service of that unit: Provided further, That the number of rated men in the Coast Artillery Corps shall not exceed 1,776: And provided further, That when Coast Artillery troops are employed in the duties of any other arm of the service they may be organized temporarily in accordance with the law pertaining to that arm, but nothing in this proviso shall be held or construed to authorize any increase in the numbers, rank, pay, or allowances of officers or enlisted men of the Coast Artillery Corps.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FIELDS: Section 4, page 4, line 10, substitute a colon for the period after the words "corps," and add: "And provided further, That hereafter the Chief of Coast Artillery shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a major general."

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this officer has imposed upon him duties in line with the officers who fill the position of major general, I think it is only fair and right that this amendment should be adopted. Therefore I offer it for the consideration of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, on page 9, in line 14, I move to strike out the word "trumpeters" and insert the word "buglers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARDNER: Page 9, line 15, strike out the word "seventeen" and insert the word "twenty-two."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, unless my calculations are wrong, the bill increases the Coast Artillery Corps by 5,882 men. Am I correct?

Mr. HAY. That is about it; yes.

Mr. GARDNER. In the report of the Chief of Coast Artillery I find, on page 4, that our Coast Artillery is 10,828 enlisted men short; that is, enlisted men of the Regular Army. Now, the way our Coast Artillery is manned is this: All our overseas fortifications are manned by Regulars, but in this country half of our guns are supposed to be manned by Regulars and half are supposed to be manned by militiamen; that is, the mortars and the guns. The mines are all manned by Regulars. Now, I find in the report of the Chief of the Coast Artillery that there are 10,828 men short of the number of Regulars, and I find that we are nearly as badly off in the matter of militiamen. We need to have 711 officers and 17,000 men to man the militia's share of the guns and mortars. Instead of that, we have only 440 officers and 7,438 men in the Coast Artillery arm of our militia, so that we are short nearly 11,000 Regulars and 10,000 militiamen from the number necessary to man our guns in our coast defenses.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Short for what purpose—for the guns and fortifications already constructed, or those to be constructed?

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] tells me that it is for the guns now mounted. I find that the Chief of the Coast Artillery says in his report for 1915, page 8:

> At the present time many of the coast fortifications have been so stripped of the personnel that they have been placed in the hands of caretakers, who can only keep the matériel in serviceable condition. The garrisons for the coast defenses of Portsmouth, the Delaware, the Potomac, the Cape Fear, Charleston, Key West, Tampa, Mobile, Galveston, and the Columbia are greatly below what they should be under the policy which contemplates that one-half of the guns and mortars be manned by regular troops.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me give the gentleman one concrete example. On the Delaware River, with which I am familiar, there are three fortifications, Fort Du Pont on the Delaware side, Fort Mott on the New Jersey side, and Fort Delaware in the center. It requires ordinarily about 800 men to properly man these three fortifications. By reason of the assignment of men to our insular possessions, we have but 200 men, and they are concentrated in Fort Du Pont. Hence the other two forts, with all their guns and valuable machinery of the Government, are in the hands of caretakers only.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I find, on page 5 of the report of the Chief of the Coast Artillery, a table showing what troops we have for manning the guns now mounted or being mounted.

One 16-inch gun is being mounted at Panama Canal; no men are provided to take care of it. We have twenty-four 14-inch guns. Manning bodies are provided for seven of them. Manning bodies are not provided for 17 of them. We have one hundred and eleven 12-inch guns. Manning bodies are provided for 75. Manning bodies are not provided for 36. And so it goes, right through the list, shortages everywhere.

I shall extend in the RECORD the entire table, taken from page 5 of the Report of the Chief of Coast Artillery, United States Army, for 1915:

Guns now mounted or being mounted (after eliminating batteries declared obsolete by the War Department Board of Review).

	16-inch.	14-inch.	12-inch.	10-inch.	8-inch.	6-inch.	5-inch.	4.7-inch.	4-inch.	3-inch.	Mortars.
Number for which manning bodies are now provided	.....	7	75	67	20	104	11	5	2	64	280
Number for which manning bodies are not provided	1	17	36	64	29	102	41	26	2	212	128

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak on the amendment. Personally, I believe that the amendment should be adopted. This is the situation with respect to the Coast Artillery: As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has said, we are woefully short of the requisite number of men to man the guns which we have emplaced up to the present time. That is not all. Under the agreement between the Chief of Coast Artillery and the Militia Division of the War Department, the militia of the various States was to be organized into Coast Artillery companies in many of the States. So that these militia organizations could man the guns that have been emplaced in equal proportion to the men in the Regular Army. In other words, half of the men to man the guns were supposed to be Regular Army men and the other half militia men.

It is a fact that the militia is about 11,000 short in is quota. It seems to me that the militia officers and the War Department will have difficulty in getting the States to build up their Coast Artillery companies if, when the States ask the Regular Army people, "What have you done toward manning the guns already emplaced?" the latter are compelled to answer that they are about five or six thousand men short. Under these conditions you can not expect the States to build up their organizations. The Regular Army must build up its own organizations to the full strength required to man its share of the coast-defense guns before it can expect the States to build up theirs. I, for one, shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be voted down. There is a great difference of opinion in the Army as to whether the Coast Artillery should have been increased. You will hardly find an officer of the Army who believes that we ought to increase it a single man. They believe that they have men enough now in the corps, and the committee put in the bill exactly what was asked for by the War Department. The committee gave them every man and every officer that was asked for by the War Department.

I am sure that if the late Secretary of War who made that recommendation and who is one of the high priests of preparedness had thought that more men were needed in the Coast Artillery he would have asked for them, but he did not ask for any more.

Now, in the Senate they are asking for an increase very much larger than that proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I trust that the House will not handicap the conference committee by adding largely to this bill when we have to meet the Senate in conference with a very much larger proposition than we have. I hope, as we have done everything that the War Department has asked us to do on this proposition, that the House will accept the judgment of the committee and of the War Department, and not the judgment of the corps which is interested in having an increase, and which, of course, would necessitate an increase of officers and promotion for everybody in that corps.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Do I understand that the gentleman from Virginia wants to keep the provision made in the House down so as to have an opportunity to make a bargain with the Senate?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman does not understand anything of the sort. I did not mean to imply anything of that sort. I did mean to say that I am informed that the Senate bill contains a very much larger increase for the Coast Artillery than is proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I suppose they will insist on their provision, just as we will insist upon ours, and if we mount up as an original proposition we will not be in the position that we ought to be in.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Should it be desired to increase the establishment, say, by 5,000 troops above that carried in the bill is it the gentleman's opinion that for the good of the Army this increase should be made in the Coast Artillery Corps in preference to the Field Artillery?

Mr. HAY. It is not; I believe if we make any increase anywhere in the bill it should be for the Field Artillery.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not take the ground that the coast fortifications are sufficiently manned, does he?

Mr. HAY. I do; I take the ground that the coast fortifications—they are not coast fortifications; they are harbor defenses—that with the increase given in this bill every harbor defense in this country will be adequately manned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The chief of the Coast Artillery in his last report informs us that the matériel of the coast defenses is well provided for, but he makes serious complaint as to the number of men to man them.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman that that is the cry that comes up from every branch of the Army. The Cavalry, which the gentleman from Missouri a moment ago talked about, wants more Cavalry, and the Infantry thinks that they ought to have more Infantry, and the Field Artillery thinks that they ought to have more Field Artillery, and the Engineers think they ought to have more Engineers; but, after all, Congress has to fix some limit to the demands which are made from all these corps for a great increase.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman to consider this: Our ocular information helps out much. On the island of Hawaii there are so many troops—8,000, or thereabouts, now—and there is a very large detachment of Coast Artillery coming back to ports like New York, Philadelphia, and Boston; and we find men who have been accustomed to man these fortifications have been returning from the Philippines and the Panama Canal, and the question naturally arises, Should we not replenish these fortifications along the coast line, where there is great danger of attack if war were to come?

Mr. HAY. I said on yesterday that in 1907, when the Coast Artillery was organized, they were given 19,000 men, with the understanding that that would be enough to man the coast defenses of this country. Since that time there have been taken away from the coast defense of this country about the number of men for which this bill provides an increase. They are asking for 52 additional companies in order to replace in this country the number of men that they have taken away from it in order to man the defenses in the insular possessions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the proviso take care of replenishing necessary to bring the coast defenses back to the normal personnel?

Mr. HAY. It does; and in the judgment of the late Secretary of War.

Mr. GARDNER. Is the gentleman correct in that statement?

Mr. HAY. I am, going by the report of the late Secretary of War who made the statement.

Mr. GARDNER. The report?

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman say that the Secretary of War recommended more?

Mr. GARDNER. No; I am speaking of his report.

Mr. HAY. I do not know what he may have in his report. I am talking about the recommendation that he made.

Mr. GARDNER. I may have mixed it up with last year's report, but the gentleman knows perfectly well that the Secretary of War took that position last year.

Mr. HAY. I am talking about the recommendations which were made.

Mr. GARDNER. I am not talking about the estimates. Good Lord! everybody knows those were cut down.

Mr. HAY. I am not talking about the estimates. I am talking about the recommendation that was made to Congress by the President in his message and by the Secretary of War as to the organizations which they desired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can not do that in my time. He can do it in some other time. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER. No; when the gentleman is through I will go on. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is entirely mistaken about the Senate bill. I hold in my hand a comparison of the present law, the Senate bill, and the House bill for every branch of the service. In the Hay bill, taking the enlisted force altogether for the Coast Artillery, there are 25,203 men, maximum and minimum both the same. The Senate bill, minimum, is 306 less than our minimum. To be sure, the Senate maximum presents rather a peculiar condition. Under certain circumstances it runs up to between three and four thousand more than our maximum—not this great quantity that we have been told about. There is a peculiar provision in the Senate bill to which I desire to refer if I can find it, to the effect that the President shall have authority to increase the Coast Artillery Corps. It is a fact that the President has authority to increase the Coast Artillery. Here it is in the Senate bill:

That the President may, in his discretion, increase the number of sergeants to 2,104, the number of corporals to 3,156, the number of privates, first class, to 5,225, and the number of privates to 15,675.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I will ask him if the President could not do that immediately upon the passage of the bill, if it became a law?

Mr. GARDNER. The House bill?

Mr. HAY. No; the Senate bill.

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, he certainly could increase it three or four thousand. I have not calculated it all out. I was astonished at the gentleman's statement, because my table shows the Senate minimum is less than ours.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that is a discretion which the President can exercise in time of peace.

Mr. GARDNER. He has no greater authority in time of war.

Mr. HAY. I know he has not. He can do it in time of peace, and therefore he can add those 20,000 men.

Mr. GARDNER. The most he can add is three or four thousand.

Mr. HAY. Not at all.

Mr. GARDNER. And as a matter of fact, what the Senate provides is less than is provided in the Hay bill.

Mr. HAY. For the skeleton companies.

Mr. GARDNER. No; the total, 24,897—that is, unless this table prepared by the War Department is wrong.

Mr. HAY. I do not know anything about that; but the point I am making is that the discretion conferred upon the President in the Senate bill does not preclude him in time of peace from putting all of those people into the Coast Artillery Corps.

Mr. GARDNER. Perhaps he might——

Mr. HAY. There is no question about it.

Mr. GARDNER. He might perhaps make it 4,000 more.

Mr. HAY. He can make it 15,000 more.

Mr. GARDNER. I hope he will.

Mr. HAY. That is the point I am making.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to read from the testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate given by Brig. Gen. Clarence R. Edwards, of the Regular Army. He states in this testimony that he has had charge of the forces in Hawaii and the Philippine Islands and is now in charge of the military defense of the Canal Zone. Here is expert testimony on this very matter of our Coast Artillery. He says:

The terms "coast defenses" and "Coast Artillery" as used by us are misnomers. Largely through these terms and the significance they carry to the ignorant or unthinking the arm of the service they represent has been enabled during the last quarter of a century to reach a degree of efficiency that places it well to the forefront of our Military Establishment. This in no wise denies the ability and earnestness and high professional attainments of our Coast Artillery personnel. But these things themselves constitute only another reason for checking, when necessary, the professional enthusiasm that would further distort our unbalanced Military Establishment and thereby add to the extravagance without adding anything to our military strength. The original fault lies with the so-called Endicott Board, which started the modern development of this arm of the military system, without any thought of the remaining parts of the system. The harm innocently, but still ignorantly, done by this board to our military development is incalculable and far outweighs its good intentions and the real benefit conferred in directing attention to our undefended coasts. The results of its activities have not only been extravagant in cost, but they have weakened us militarily and have made our defense methods the laughingstock of every serious foreign student who has studied them. Unpleasant as the task is, I feel it incumbent upon me to take this opportunity to urge new study of this part of our defensive system before we go to extremes that can do no more than make us ridiculous in the military world.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman realize that Gen. Edwards is the most extreme advocate of any man that has appeared before our committee touching additional fortifications for Panama? Gen. Edwards's statement as to the fortifications of America, if it bears the construction that the gentleman is undertaking to give, is not shared by any other officer that I know of, and is not shared by him in the estimates and requests that he made touching additional fortifications at Panama.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. He asks in this statement to be given a mobile force of 27,000 men to back up these fortifications they propose to arm with coast artillery, and these defenses. If there is any one thing that, in my judgment, has been exploded, it is the policy of expending millions of money upon fixed fortifications.

The Military Committee had before us an officer of the Coast Artillery, a member of the General Staff, from the staff of Gen. Wood, at New York, and he told us that, in the judgment of the experts who had studied it in order to defend those coast defenses, in the judgment of the War College, they felt, if I understood the testimony, we must be prepared to place 27,000 men behind each fort to defend the fort. In other words, it would require, in the opinion of the experts, 750,000 troops to defend these forts; not troops to defend the country, but troops to defend the forts supposed to be the defenders of the country.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman think those troops have got to be fixed behind every fort?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is the testimony of the experts.

Mr. GARDNER. Is that the gentleman's understanding of the facts; does the gentleman really think that?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do think so, because I am satisfied from what I have studied of the experiences in the war in Europe and the testimony before this committee was that these guns that are mounted in these forts are, none of them, so mounted at present that they can be turned in defense of those who attack them in the rear, and any fort, such as those we have, mounted to defend every one of our harbors, can be overcome by attacks in the rear or in the reverse, as the military men express it. We have the testimony of those men that if we are to defend these forts we must be prepared to defend them in the rear. And furthermore, it is a matter of testimony before the committee that these very forts now are armed with guns 20 years old, mounted upon carriages that would not permit them to be fired at the angles now discovered they should be fired at. In other words, the entire system of defense of our coast has got to be revised because of the experience of the war in Europe, so I think that this House would be wise to follow the recommendation of the Secretary of War and the member of the General Staff who testified before our committee, speaking, as I understood it, for the General Staff in asking for the increase granted in this bill.

Part of testimony of Capt. C. E. Kilbourne, General Staff, United States Coast Artillery Corps, before House Military Committee Friday, January 28, 1916, page 790:

Capt. KILBOURNE. I thought it might be of some interest to the committee if I would speak of the work that has been done in the Eastern Department in the matter of preparation of plans for the defense of the Atlantic coast and the Gulf coast.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Capt. KILBOURNE. About four or five years ago the National Land Defense Board worked up plans for the defense of the harbors from the rear, and those plans were approved and accepted until the development of those long-range guns in the European war. That necessitated the recasting of all our plans, because originally the idea was that we would supply enough troops, called Coast Guards, to protect the rear of the fortifications against land guns, which fire from 12,000 to 15,000 yards, and possibly more; some reports are that they carry much farther than that. That plan had to be abandoned, because it is not possible with any mobile force that we could hope to raise to protect any one of those harbor forts—not any one, but most of them—by holding an intrenched line far enough from the city to prevent the enemy emplacing artillery within range of it. It runs up to 130,000,000, some of them, before you get all the way around.

Consequently plans had to be adopted for the defense of the immediate rear of the batteries with emplacements, intrenchments, entanglements, etc., to protect the rear of the batteries from any sudden rush that might be made under cover of darkness or fog to destroy those batteries and admit a fleet to the harbor. For the defense of the balance of the country we had to adopt the system of meeting them at landing places, surveying the country to ascertain the best defensive lines, arrangements being made to fight them on each one of those lines—to fight a delaying action, falling back and trying to hold them until reenforcements come. There has been a board in each coast defense, given to the survey and study of the terrain this year. I have one complete report here, in case the committee would like to see the details of it.

Advance data on those reports have been submitted and tabulated, and it results in what the department considers, for the immediate defense of the forts, an irreducible minimum of 29½ regiments of Infantry. We have 22 coast defenses, some with as high as three or four forts, and each fort should have its immediate rear guard.

Now, those troops can not be considered in connection with the mobile army which is fighting at a distance from the forts, for the reason that just about the time there is a severe attack out there that might be the very time that would be selected for a raid on the forts with a view to slipping a fleet into the harbor. So those troops must be separate and apart from any that we consider for the defense of this coast.

The CHAIRMAN. Do I understand that you mean you want 29 regiments of Infantry to be stationed all the time in the rear of these forts?

Capt. KILBOURNE. The minute war threatens they ought to be there.

The CHAIRMAN. Where would you draw them from?

Capt. KILBOURNE. We could not draw them from the Eastern Department; that is certain.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that; but I am talking now about this: In the event of war, what plan is there proposed to have these 29 Infantry regiments in such shape as to bring them where you want them?

Capt. KILBOURNE. This report has not yet been submitted to the General Staff, whose duty it is to work out those details. This is just as it was worked out in the Eastern Department and prepared to be submitted. In fact, it was completed only about two days before——

The CHAIRMAN. I understand, however, your idea is these 29 regiments should be apart from the proposed mobile army?

Capt. KILBOURNE. Yes, sir; I think that within a short time after a war broke out we could replace those Infantry regiments with militia regiments—volunteers—so they could go to the mobile army, where their training would be more valuable. Its duty would be merely to hold an intrenched position, which does not require the discipline, the training, nor the hardening processes which Infantry for field service requires.

We asked one of these local boards then to take up the question of how many troops they would need to meet an army that might be landed at favorable landing places in their immediate neighborhood and to fight that army on these prepared lines that they had surveyed—to fight a delaying action. We said, "You may assume that if you can hold a probable enemy for two weeks you will be reinforced by a force sufficient to defeat them; that is, anything you can hold for two weeks we will send you enough troops to defeat." Each one, working separately, has submitted a report, these reports working out altogether to 45 divisions.

The CHAIRMAN. Forty-five Infantry divisions?

Capt. KILBOURNE. Part Infantry and part Cavalry.

Then, having these local studies completed, the department board took them and consolidated them with a view to the matter of reenforcing, and our basis was that if we could have a few more troops than were required for any two places we would have enough to make a reasonably assured defense there. On that basis the coast was divided into three main defensive areas: From Penobscot Bay to New York; from New York to the entrance of the Chesapeake; and from the entrance of the Chesapeake down to and including Alabama, we might say. We did not go into the situation on the other side, because that is a problem for the Western Department mobile defense. We found that by taking these three divisions we could reduce this number of troops to 25 divisions.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be nine Infantry regiments to a division?

Capt. KILBOURNE. It works out altogether, sir, to 743,000 men.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to anticipate what I may have to say to the House very shortly in presenting the fortification bill, but I am not willing to let go unchallenged statements which I feel are very, very erroneous.

It is not true, in my judgment—and I speak after seven years' experience on the committee dealing with fortifications—that our fortifications are antiquated, that they are useless, or that they represent, as implied by the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER], a menace instead of a defense. The gentleman talks about the need of 750,000 men to defend them from the rear. Now, the very fact that he seems——

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not until I get through with making a connected statement—the very fact that he seems to think that these men must be stationed at each fortification shows a total misunderstanding, as I view it, of the purpose of fortifications. Now, I have very often stated it, and it has been repeated and repeated by military officers, so that it would seem that it would be clearly understood, that the purpose of a coast fortification is to deny to an enemy's fleet certain waters covered by that fortification, and to permit the use of such waters by our own fleet. It is not contemplated that it will prevent the landing of troops anywhere on the coast, but within the radius of the guns it will prevent those waters being used by an enemy; and the test of a fortification is this, that it serves its purpose when it forces an enemy to land in order to subdue it.

Now, it is true that if an army of an enemy is landed and makes an attack upon a fortification from the rear it takes a mobile army perhaps to defend such a fortification, but presumably if we have properly prepared that fortification, assuming that the control of the sea has passed from us, we will have driven the enemy to some place not near as good as the fortified area would be, where he will presumably be met by a mobile force. Now, if the enemy defeats that force and there is nothing else in his way, he can go and take these fortifications from the rear; but to assume that fortifications are a menace, and that we have done a foolish and absurd thing in building them is to assume something that is not warranted by any testimony I know of given by any officer at any time in the history of the Government.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will. If I had known it was the gentleman who desired to ask me before, I would have yielded sooner.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The point to which I wished to direct the attention of the committee was that this was not my opinion or my statement, but was the testimony of Capt. Kilbourne, of the Coast Artillery, himself a member of the General Staff, detailed with Gen. Wood at New York, who stated that, after a careful study that they had had upon the subject, the conclusion was what I have stated to the committee. The gentleman can read it for himself.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know Capt. Kilbourne very well. I have been with him a number of times at fortifications when there was target practice. I was with him recently in New York when the purchase of some land was being considered. I have not read the particular testimony of which the gentleman has spoken, but I guarantee that what Capt. Kilbourne meant to convey was that, assuming a force had landed in America and that a particular fortification was being attacked from the rear, there would be required a certain number of mobile troops to defend that fortification, and then counting up each fortification that it would require the number of troops of which the gentleman has spoken; but that does not prove that your fortifications are weaknesses and does not prove anything the gentleman seemed to imply.

Now, I maintain again that our fortifications are, of their kind, the very best in the world. There are some things that need to be done to improve them. I hope to bring forward some items in the bill this year looking to that improvement, but I am not willing that the statement should go out that the fortifications are obsolete and that the character of the mounts are such as to make the guns useless. I have but recently come from a test made by battleships against an emplacement that was typical of our seacoast emplacements. I happen to have seen with my own eyes some of the results of the fire by these ships. And any man who has seen what I have seen within the week and who could say that our fortifications are useless takes a liberty with his speech that is absolutely inconceivable to me in face of the facts.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Do you know that the War Department has in contemplation now the changing of the mounts of all these guns, so that they may be elevated at another angle?

Mr. SHERLEY. I deny it. I say we have increased the elevation of some from a 10-degree elevation to 15, and we propose in building new guns to have an elevation very much beyond that. I also say that we are going to take some old guns and mount them for higher-angle fire, but I expressly deny, as not being the situation, that we are going to have to change the carriage of most of our guns or even a large percentage of the guns that are now mounted. I deny that they are not effective. I deny that they are obsolete.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has expressed the matter very clearly, as he always does, in regard to these harbor fortifications. It was testified before our committee that it was contemplated increasing the possible elevation somewhat, owing to lessons that have been brought out of the present war.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I carried an item in the fortification bill, and explained it on the floor last year, for the change of gun carriages. Here is what happened: We had a disappearing gun carriage with a maximum range of 15°. Some of those were mounted so as to have a depression of 5 and an elevation of 10. Now, we altered the carriages so as to give them a maximum elevation of 15 and a minus of none, and with our new guns we are proposing to increase greatly the elevation, the purpose being to increase the range of fire.

Mr. TILSON. Unfortunately, I was not here in the last Congress, but what the gentleman states is absolutely correct. With the slight change in angle of fire the very same guns will be able to reach a very much greater distance than they do now.

Mr. FARR. May I ask what range?

Mr. TILSON. Well, it is believed we can reach to 10 miles effectively.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit again, we are going to mount some 12-inch guns on carriages that will permit an elevation of 30° and better, that will have a range of 30,000 yards. We will have a range of about 19,000 yards with the 12-inch guns, with elevation of 15°, shooting a lighter projectile.

Mr. GARDNER. As a matter of fact, you have got to reduce your projectile to 1,200 pounds?

Mr. SHERLEY. You increase your range by lightening the projectile.

Mr. TILSON. Of course what you gain in range you have to lose in the weight of the projectile. However, I was going to speak of another use of the Coast Artillery. The Coast Artillery is trained as infantry as well as coast artillery, so that in the last resort they would be able to take care of themselves as infantry and could assist in defending the place fortified in case the mobile troops had been defeated and the country overrun, which it would mean if their forts were attacked in rear.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You refer to the "last resort." Is it not a fact that the suggestion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] is based entirely on the last resort? If we were compelled to defend our forts from the rear it would mean that the Navy had lost control of the sea and the enemy had gotten up the edge of the coast and had gotten around to our fortress.

Mr. TILSON. It would mean that the Navy had been driven from the sea, the mobile force had been defeated at the place of landing, and the country was overrun by the enemy. Of course these harbor fortifications are absolutely necessary to protect our naval bases, and the Coast Artillery personnel necessary to man them should surely be provided.

I was going on to speak of a further use of Coast Artillery that thus far has not been mentioned at all. It is very well known that in the present war in Europe much larger guns than were ever used in the field before have been used, a sort of semimobile artillery, a very large gun, mounted on a railway car and moved to the place where needed. It is contemplated that we are to be provided with some of these guns, and that the Coast Artillery men are to handle them; that in case of an invasion or attempt at landing by an enemy the Coast Artillery would not be confined within the forts, but would be able to come out of the forts with these large semimobile guns.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. TILSON. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. The Coast Artillery would be able to come out of the forts, take these large semimobile guns on railway carriages, and move them to the place where they were needed. It happens that our railways are in most cases very fortunately situated for this purpose along both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. TILSON. With pleasure.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I may say I was very much interested in the gentleman's statement that these very large guns in what he calls the semimobile artillery were mounted on railway cars. He does not mean that guns of the caliber of the 42-centimeter guns were fired from railway cars, does he?

Mr. TILSON. They can not be fired from a railway car standing loose on the track. Of course, the gentleman understands that. But they can be run into emplacements or temporary emplacements on the coast.

Mr. SLAYDEN. As a matter of fact, those guns have always been taken off and put onto concrete emplacements already made. I understand they do use some fairly large guns from railway cars, but I never heard it suggested before that those very large guns were so employed.

Mr. TILSON. That is so. They use some quite large guns from the railway cars themselves; but it is intended that these very large guns shall be run onto a temporary platform or emplacement where they can be used.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, we expect to build a 16-inch mortar that may be fired from a car, and it may be possible also to do the same with 14-inch guns.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Has that been done?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not in this country, and so far as I know it has not been done in that form abroad.

Mr. TILSON. Of course, the gentleman knows that with a mortar or a great gun like that, using a high angle of fire, the recoil is much more nearly vertical, so that the lateral resultant of the recoil is very much less than if the guns were fired more nearly horizontal.

These are uses for coast artillery that we have never had before, and as you can readily see, they are important uses. In case of an invasion or an attempted landing upon the shore of this country such a force would be of the very greatest importance. Instead of being, as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] describes, a third line of defense, they would really be a part of the second line of defense, to meet the invader at the shore. Therefore it seems to me that this part of the Army could very well stand a considerable increase, and I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

I think that if this House makes any increase more than is provided for in the bill, that increase should be made in the mobile forces of the Army. The committee has already increased the Coast Artillery as far as the War Department desires it increased, and in my opinion any more troops added to that corps would be deliberately thrown away by this House.

The Coast Artillery, it is true, is a necessary and vital part of our coast defense, but even in time of war three-fourths of the Coast Artillery troops would probably not fire a shot, because under the present system they are scattered all over our coasts, many of them being stationed at most unimportant places that probably would never be threatened by a foe, and therefore they could never possibly be utilized, and it would be a great mistake to further augment such garrisons.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman think it would be advisable to withdraw the troops that may be at any of these posts that he speaks of and thus leave those posts exposed in time of war?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not in favor of withdrawing the Coast Artillery from any of the most important posts, but I would be in favor of withdrawing them from some of the unimportant posts; say, for instance, Fort Hunt, down here below Washington. In my opinion there is no necessity of any troops being there, except caretakers for the guns. They would never be threatened in case of war.

Mr. KAHN. I understood that those troops would be taken down to Fort Henry and in that direction as soon as the fortifications down there are completed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I think there are dozens of places around our coasts where Coast Artillery garrisons could well be dispensed with.

Another point: It has been stated that the Coast Artillery Militia is short under the present plan of the War Department, which calls for the militia furnishing half of the men to man the guns in time of war. They may be short in numbers now, but under the provisions of this bill—under the pay provision, which is incorporated—the Coast Artillery Militia will be speedily recruited up to the full authorized strength and the strength that is expected by the War Department.

I do not want my remarks to be construed as a criticism of the Coast Artillery in any way, because I consider it as now constituted one of the most efficient branches of our Army. Its head, Gen. Weaver, is one of the ablest and most capable men in the service; and I believe that the armament and equipment now provided for our principal ports, New York and San Francisco, makes them absolutely impregnable from successful attack by any battleship fleet that could ever be brought against them.

I think it would be a mistake and an absolute squandering of money to make any further increase in this corps in addition to that provided in the bill.

Mr. GARDNER. I just want to correct a statement that I made. I find that under the Senate bill the President may add altogether 5,112 enlisted men to the force for the Coast Artillery.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the number of commissioned officers of the Corps of Engineers shall be increased by 1 colonel, 1 lieutenant colonel, 4 majors, 15 captains, 15 first lieutenants, and 15 second lieutenants, and the enlisted force of said corps shall be increased by 15 companies, to be constituted as the President may direct, and the Engineer band shall hereafter have the same organization as that hereinbefore provided for bands of the Coast Artillery Corps: Provided, That hereafter vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army shall be filled as far as may be consistent with the interests of the military service by promotion from the Corps of Cadets at the United States Military Academy: Provided further, That vacancies remaining in any fiscal year after the assignment of cadets of the class graduating in that fiscal year may be filled by the transfer of lieutenants of the line of the Army of the United States who pass a satisfactory professional examination: Provided further, That vacancies not filled as hereinbefore prescribed may be filled from civil life, as provided in the act of Congress approved February 27, 1911.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 10, in line 16: Strike out the word "constituted" and insert the word "organized."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I know, of course, that the gentleman and the entire committee gave careful consideration to every portion of this bill; but I would like to know what evidence the committee had before it to justify the fixing of the officers of the Corps of Engineers at the figures mentioned in the section.

Mr. HAY. We had before us the testimony of Gen. Kingman, the Chief of Engineers, who desired a very much larger number of officers than are provided for here. But the increase in the Engineers, who are a part of the line of the Army, provided 15 companies of Engineers, and we provided the officers necessary to officer that number of enlisted men. The 15 companies would be 1 regiment and 3 companies, and we provided a colonel, a lieutenant colonel, 4 majors, 15 captains, 15 first lieutenants, and 15 second lieutenants.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Can the gentleman state from memory what Gen. Kingman's opinion was upon that point?

Mr. HAY. Gen. Kingman wanted the Chief of Engineers to be a major general; he wanted two or three brigadier generals, I forget which; he wanted a very much larger number of colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, and other officers, which would have increased his corps by somewhere in the neighborhood of over 100 officers.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would like to say to the gentleman that, while I am not able to state just how much the Corps of Engineers ought to be enlarged, I think it should be increased considerably beyond what is provided for in this bill.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman means in the way of officers?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; for I happen to know myself from my acquaintance with that corps of officers and the work they are doing that they have not a sufficient force to perform the duties required of them. We increased the number of officers of the corps in the river and harbor bill of 1911, which increase was to extend over a period of five years, I believe, and is probably about up now. My information is, however, that the river and harbor work has not as yet got the full benefit of the increase, because the War Department keeps using these officers for other purposes. Of course, an engineer officer's duties are not confined to engineering. He has to perform military services besides. The department is very free to use the officers of that corps in many lines of military work, and very properly, because they are the cream of that profession, and they are needed in various places other than in engineering fields, and for that reason, in addition to the demands of river and harbor work, I think the number ought to be very considerably increased; but, as I say, I am not prepared to state now just to what extent. I should have to leave that to the experts.

Mr. HAY. I am sorry that I can not agree with my friend from Florida. I remember that the Engineer Corps has been increased twice since I have been here, once in 1905, again in 1911, and now it is being increased again. Gen. Kingman testified that even now he did not have as many officers in his corps as the law allows. It seems they find difficulty in keeping their corps filled. These officers in this bill are provided for mobile troops, for engineer troops, not for river and harbor work or any work of that kind. We are providing just a sufficient number of them to officer the enlisted men provided for in the 15 companies asked.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not believe it will require even more than that number to do the work that this bill has cut out for the Engineer Corps to do?

Mr. HAY. We have not cut out any work for the Engineer officers, except to command these troops; that is all.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is a good deal. Besides there is a great deal left to the executive head, and it is hard to tell just how much under the law will be required of them.

Mr. HAY. They are going to be organized under the law which now obtains.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I understand that, and when that organization is perfected I am a little bit afraid we shall find quite a shortage of engineers.

Mr. HAY. I hope not. I am very sure we are giving them all they need.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have no desire now to do more than to state my views, which are based upon knowledge gained from many years of experience and observation. I do know that the Engineer Corps has not officers enough to do the work required of it, and I think the number of its officers ought to be increased very considerably, perhaps doubled in some of the grades.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the formal amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN]. In line with this discussion, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee how many engineers are to-day detailed on river and harbor work?

Mr. HAY. I can not answer that; but I suppose the gentleman can answer it better than I can. He ought to be informed on that subject.

Mr. FREAR. I have some information on it, and that is the reason I have taken the floor, in view of the question that was propounded to the chairman of the committee. As I now understand it, 65 officers, or about that number, are employed regularly in looking after the improvements on the rivers and harbors and creeks of the country. On an average, there are something like 250 new surveys in each river and harbor bill. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think it would be better for the needs of the service at this time that more of these officers should attend to their legitimate military duties instead of being put on this work?

Mr. HAY. I agree with the gentleman entirely. I think civilian engineers could do the work just as well.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with that view.

Mr. FREAR. Am I yielding to the gentleman, or does he wish the floor?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It does not make any difference so long as I get the time. Of course, if we were to approach the subject from the angle from which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] views it, we all might easily reach the conclusion he does, because I fancy he thinks three or four engineers could do all the engineering work that ought to be done on the rivers and harbors of the country, with the creeks that he so often speaks of thrown in; but I disagree with him as to that, and I say most emphatically that if we are to continue to do the work we have been doing and which is necessary to be done if the great waterways of the country are to be improved so as to meet the demands of our rapidly growing commerce, then we will require more engineers than is now provided by law, supplemented by the increase provided in this bill. Of course if we cut down the work, as the gentleman suggests, we would not need so many.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, there has evidently been a great change of sentiment in this House during the last 12 months, and even during the last 3 months. When in the last Congress a little more than a year ago the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] undertook to show that something in the direction of preparedness should be begun then, only a handful—some 30 Members of this House—could be persuaded that our country was in any possible danger or that there was any necessity for any action whatever. The gentleman from Massachusetts was denounced from one end of the country to the other as a jingo, and it seemed that the peace-at-any-price people, the people who believed that our great country could never be drawn into war, and the people who believed that if we should be drawn into war we could defend ourselves by raising a million or two men overnight, were in full control of the administration at Washington and of public sentiment. It seemed a hopeless task to attempt to convince either the administration or the Congress that there should be any increase whatever of our military or naval establishment. It seemed to be the general feeling that we should be untrue to our ideals, or that we should in some way interfere with the realization of the dream of general disarmament that was to follow the European war, if we so much as added a man to our little Army or a ship to our Navy.

But during the spring and summer some things happened. The possibility of becoming involved in war did not seem so remote in the fall, the people had become or were becoming aroused to their danger, and the President himself had become convinced that something must be done. In his message at the opening of this Congress on December 7 the President outlined a program, much of which is embodied in the bill now before us, and added "At least so much by way of preparation for defense seems to me to be absolutely imperative now. We can not do less."

Mr. Chairman, I do not understand how anybody who will read the history of the last five or six years of the last great European war, the war between Napoleon and the rest of Europe, can fail to be impressed with the singular parallel between what happened then and what is happening now, so far as neutral rights and trade are concerned. Practically the same things happened then that are happening now. There is nothing new under the sun. President Jefferson and President Madison made every kind of effort to keep our country out of the war. They declined to take even a step toward building up an Army or a Navy for fear it should tempt us to defend our rights. They wrote endless notes and protests against the destruction of American ships and of American lives, but in spite of all this our country was drawn into the war, and as Woodrow Wilson indicates in his History of the American People (Vol. III, p. 212), was drawn in wholly unprepared and on the wrong side. Mr. Wilson says:

> France was doing more to injure neutral trade than England was. That very spring (1812) a French fleet put to sea commissioned to burn American merchantmen wherever found.

The submarine may be a new weapon, but the idea of destroying merchant ships is not new.

What was worse—

> the risk of the war was not a whit more obvious than its deep impolicy. Napoleon was the enemy of the civilized world; had been America's own enemy in disguise. England was fighting him almost alone, and now America had joined the forces of Napoleon in fact, if not in intention, as he had subtly planned.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not say that we are going to be drawn into the great European war of to-day as we were drawn into the great war of a little more than a century ago, but no man in his senses, who knows his history and who has followed in the light of history the events of the past year, can doubt that there is danger, very real danger, and that lack of preparedness contributes to the danger.

One blunder of a century ago, viz, continuing entirely unprepared until drawn actually into war, we are to-day very tardily seeking not to commit again. The bill before us is a step in advance, though not much more than a step. A century ago we relied almost entirely upon the militia, the old militia that included every man of military age trained one day a year. That militia was defeated in practically every battle in the so-called War of 1812.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Is it not a fact that Gen. William Henry Harrison got up as far as London, Canada, and won a battle on the way up?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; we won one or two little skirmishes, but only one real victory in the War of 1812, and that was at New Orleans after the war was over, and it had no effect on the treaty or anything else.

Now, we begin by bringing our present Regular Army organizations up to full strength, a most important provision for the creation of efficiency, and we seek to add something—too little, in my opinion—to the number of the organizations. But we have not cut loose yet from the militia idea. We depend upon the Organized Militia or National Guard for our chief reserve, without bringing it under full Federal control. I do not believe that this arrangement can work satisfactorily. It so happened that when we fought on the side of Napoleon in the last great European war, some of the governors of the New England States which opposed our participation in the war, did all they could to prevent the militia of their States from responding to the call of their country. Some governors refused to call their militia out or to allow it to leave the State. It seems to me that such a situation is not impossible under this bill. The National Guard is entitled to great credit for the work it has done in recent years against many discouragements. It is entitled to recognition and to encouragement, through action of Congress, but I do not believe we should depend upon it as a reserve immediately available in time of emergency. We might bring the guard under full Federal control, holding it under the Army and not under the militia clause of the Constitution, or we might create such a Federal volunteer reserve as the proposed continental army, which would doubtless take in a considerable part of the guard, and leave a considerable part for State control, but what we really ought to do is to work toward some system of general military training, which should be a part of the education, or should complete the education, of every young man.

Mr. Chairman, if we look facts squarely in the face we must admit that the United States of America is a great, magnificent Nation of wealth worshipers, ease lovers, and pleasure seekers. Too many of our young men seem to have no higher purpose in life than to obtain money to spend on pleasure. Too many of them have absolutely no sense of responsibility for service of any kind to their country or to their communities. A period of military training and discipline would work wonders with them, would make men of them, and would enable them to serve not only their country in time of need, but themselves at all times to some purpose. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the Infantry arm shall be increased by 10 regiments, and each regiment of said arm, exclusive of the Porto Rico regiment, shall consist of 1 colonel, 1 lieutenant colonel, 3 majors, 16 captains, 16 first lieutenants, 16 second lieutenants, 1 headquarters company, 1 supply company, 1 machine-gun company, and 12 Infantry companies organized into 3 battalions of 4 companies each. Of the officers herein provided for, except supply officers, the lieutenants not required for duty with Infantry companies or with headquarters, supply, or machine-gun companies shall be available for detail as battalion adjutants and such other details as may be lawful.

Each Infantry headquarters company shall consist of 1 captain, who shall be the regimental adjutant, 1 sergeant major, 3 battalion sergeants major, 1 first sergeant, who shall be the drum major, 2 color sergeants, 1 mess sergeant, 1 supply sergent, 2 cooks, 1 horseshoer, 1 band leader, 1 assistant band leader, 1 sergeant trumpeter, 2 band sergeants, 4 band corporals, 2 musicians first class, four musicians second class, 13 musicians third class, 1 sergeant orderly, and 16 orderlies.

Each Infantry supply company shall consist of 2 captains, who shall be regimental supply officers, 1 first lieutenant, and 2 second lieutenants, who shall be battalion supply officers, 2 regimental supply sergeants, 3 battalion supply sergeants, and such noncommissioned officers and other enlisted men as the Secretary of War may authorize to be supplied from the Quartermaster Corps and other staff corps or departments: Provided, That the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the supply company, supplied from the regiment and the Quartermaster Corps, shall, when in garrison, be available at all time to assist the quartermaster thereof.

Each Infantry machine-gun company shall consist of 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, 1 second lieutenant, 1 first sergeant, 1 mess sergeant, 1 supply sergeant, 1 stable sergeant, 7 sergeants, 8 corporals, 2 cooks, 1 mechanic, and 48 privates, of whom not to exceed 25 per cent shall be rated as privates, first class.

Each Infantry company shall consist of 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, 1 second lieutenant, 1 first sergeant, 1 mess sergeant, 1 supply sergeant, 3 sergeants, 6 corporals, 2 cooks, 2 trumpeters, 1 mechanic, and 48 privates: Provided, That the President, in his discretion, may increase the number of sergeants in any company of Infantry to 5, the number of corporals to 10, the number of cooks to 3, and the number of privates to 126.

The commissioned officers required in each regiment of Infantry for headquarter, supply, and machine-gun companies and for the Infantry companies organized into battalions shall be assigned from among the officers hereinbefore authorized for the regiment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, on page 11, line 25, I move to strike out the word "trumpeter" and insert the word "bugler."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 25, strike out the word "trumpeter" and insert the word "bugler."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, on page 12, line 25, I move to strike out the word "trumpeters" and insert the word "buglers."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 25, strike out the word "trumpeters" and insert the word "buglers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. On page 13, line 3, I move to strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "sixteen," so it will read "16 corporals."

Mr. HAY. I would like to ask the gentleman for what purpose he offers that amendment.

Mr. KAHN. The number of corporals will be entirely inadequate. The corporal takes charge of a squad of seven men, and when we give a corporal to the requisite number of squads we ought to have 16.

Mr. HAY. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On page 12, lines 16 to 21, in reference to the Infantry machine-gun companies, how many machine guns does a company handle?

Mr. HAY. Under the present regulations they have four machine guns to a company.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know how many machine guns the Army has?

Mr. HAY. One thousand and seventy-seven machine guns.

Mr. MANN. Do they have a number in reserve?

Mr. HAY. Some are in reserve.

Mr. MANN. How many is it expected will be provided for the reserve?

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois while we are on the machine-gun proposition that for the last three years the committee has appropriated from $150,000 to $200,000 a year for machine guns. The Chief of Ordnance has not used any of those appropriations, but has turned them into the Treasury, because he had not been able to select a type of gun which was satisfactory to him. Hence we have had no machine guns manufactured during the last three years.

Mr. MANN. I am the least expert of anyone I know of on the subject, but I have gained the impression some way that in Europe machine guns are playing an active part.

Mr. HAY. They are playing a very active part.

Mr. MANN. I have seen them operate, and it seems to me that they are a very effective means of defense. I should think that they might by this time, or very soon, with the experience gained abroad, find some satisfactory type of machine gun and have some in reserve. I would much rather trust in the main the operation of a machine gun in the hands of people who did not know a great deal about firing than to trust their knowledge and expertness in shooting at a target with a rifle. At least I would feel more comfortable if I was behind the machine gun. I think it is a very effective weapon. Of course, I assume that it is possible to provide a machine gun which when you want to use it will be ready for use, notwithstanding what is reported to have occurred down at Columbus, in New Mexico.

Mr. HAY. I have not been informed whether that was absolutely true or a newspaper report.

Mr. MANN. I do not know, but I suppose if it did occur it was some accident.

Mr. HAY. I was going to say that, if it did occur, it was something that might have happened to anybody or to any gun, and I do not know that our soldiers should be blamed for it. Perhaps the gun jammed, or something of that sort, which might happen to anybody or to any kind of a gun. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the committee is thoroughly alive to the importance of having a large number of machine guns in reserve. They have no more now, because the Ordnance Department has not been able to select a type of gun that they wanted to manufacture.

Mr. MANN. Then, the shortage in the reserve is not because Congress has refused to appropriate the money, but because the War Department itself has declined to expend the money which has been appropriated?

Mr. HAY. That is exactly true.

Mr. MANN. We have done very well in appropriating the money, and I think we ought to appropriate still more; but I am quite sure that the War Department ought to get a hustle on itself.

Mr. HAY. I think so.

Mr. MANN. And speed up some, and find some gun that it is willing to have constructed and put in reserve.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that some years ago—three or four years ago—Col. Lewis, an Army officer of the Coast Artillery, had what he thought was a most excellent machine gun. As was his duty, he offered it to the United States Government. The Ordnance Department, or the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications, turned the gun down and would not use it. Col. Lewis took the gun abroad and, I am informed, sold it to England, to Russia, to France, and to Holland, and that is the gun that is now doing the execution that we read about in the newspapers every day.

Mr. MANN. That was a very unfortunate mistake on the part of the War Department.

Mr. HAY. It was.

Mr. MANN. Unfortunately, all of us do make mistakes.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. MANN. And that is one mistake that is not chargeable to Congress. Usually everything that is not done or that is done, if there is any mistake made, is charged to Congress by the people in the country.

Mr. HAY. That was not the fault of Congress; we did not turn it down.

Mr. MANN. I say that mistake was not chargeable to Congress, but even then, if they did turn down a gun, they ought to be prepared in the War Department to have a type of gun selected which can be manufactured and put in reserve. I believe myself that if we should ever be invaded and an enemy should get beyond the shore, there is nothing that will be more important than to have plenty of ammunition and machine guns and some men to operate them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the Chief of Ordnance stated before the committee that he expected to be able to select a proper type of gun very soon, and they are asking quite an appropriation for the purchase or manufacture of these machine guns, and these guns will be provided for in the appropriation bill.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether it is not a fact that when Col. Lewis had his gun tried by the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications, it burst?

Mr. HAY. I am not aware of that fact.

Mr. GARDNER. That is my impression—that he made it of cast iron or something inferior to the best steel. When it was tried by the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications, my recollection is, that it burst. I do not think the board could be expected to judge of what the gun would have done if it had not burst. I am not defending, as the gentleman probably knows, the Chief of Ordnance, because I think him entirely too conservative in his views. Did he not testify over a year ago that the Bennett-Mercier gun, which we have at the present time, was unsatisfactory, and that we were going to try the Vickers?

Mr. HAY. He did.

Mr. GARDNER. And that is over a year ago?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. And nothing has been done?

Mr. HAY. Nothing has been done. I will say to the gentleman that so far as the Lewis gun is concerned, I think he is mistaken in saying that it burst. It may have done so once.

Mr. GARDNER. I may be mistaken.

Mr. HAY. But Col. Lewis afterwards perfected it, and I know I saw an account of where this gun had been fired from an airship at a target on the ground, the airship being at a considerable elevation, and the target was struck every time the gun was fired.

Mr. GARDNER. My recollection is very hazy on the matter. I thought the gun had burst.

Mr. HAY. It was my impression at the time, although, of course, I did not know anything about it as an expert, that it was an excellent gun and ought to have been adopted.

Mr. GARDNER. That is very obvious.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question, if I may be permitted. Is it not in evidence before the committee that the Ordnance Department had found a quite satisfactory machine gun that is being manufactured by private manufacturers, and that it believed that in case of immediate need we could soon secure a supply of those guns from the private manufacturers?

Mr. HAY. I think so. I think a statement of that kind was made, but that was the Vickers gun, as I remember, and the statement was also made that they had not been able to do anything about it because they were manufacturing the gun for the allies. It is an English gun, and we would have to get the permission, possibly, of the English Government.

Mr. TILSON. Before we could manufacture it?

Mr. HAY. Before we could manufacture it. I think we ought to be able in this country to get a gun of our own.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are the department officials withholding the selection of the proper type of gun awaiting information resulting from observation of the European war? I might say that the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department I believe testified before a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that our officers detailed to the European forces are obliged to withhold very valuable information until the close of the war, and when the war is ended they will be privileged to divulge that information, which will be of great value to our naval officials in the design and construction of our modern battleships. I was wondering whether the Army officials are withholding making recommendations as to arms for the same reason.

Mr. HAY. I do not think that is true of this machine gun; it may be true of the other.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. EMERSON. Did I understand that this machine gun shot from an aeroplane hit the target every time?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. EMERSON. Have we got any of these guns in the service now?

Mr. HAY. We have not; we did not accept that gun.

Mr. EMERSON. I think we ought to have a few of those down in Mexico now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I simply want to say in reference to the Lewis gun that at the time that gun was tried it was whispered around—and I think probably with some cause—that there was jealousy back of the refusal of the Ordnance Board to accept the Lewis gun. Capt. Lewis had made certain criticisms that were construed as a reflection on the military ability and efficiency of some of the officers of the Army during the Spanish-American War, and it was whispered that he was punished therefor by a refusal to accept his gun, and that that was the reason it was turned down.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said it was not Congress's fault that it was turned down. That is probably true, but if there was anything in the report that a gun that had been invented by an officer of the United States Army was turned down because that United States Army officer had created some ill feeling and friction among other United States Army officers by some acrimonious criticism, I submit that should not be an excuse for the turning down of a valuable invention that might have been a great benefit to this country; and I think that if that is the case Congress should pass some law containing a provision making that impossible.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee. Page 11, section 6, there is an increase provided for of 10 regiments and a certain number of officers, and there are 16 captains, 16 first lieutenants, and 16 second lieutenants. Is not 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, and 1 second lieutenant enough for each company?

Mr. HAY. Yes; but these other officers are used for commanding the supply company, the headquarters company, and the machine-gun company, as well as other details, such as quartermaster's duties which they have to perform.

Mr. KAHN. And battalion adjutant.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. But in that portion of the bill where the supply companies are spoken of and another part where the machine-gun company is spoken of and another paragraph or sentence where the Infantry headquarters are spoken of, in each there is a provision for a captain made.

Mr. HAY. But the gentleman will find they are to be detailed from the officers of the regiment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There would not be enough then, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There are 12 Infantry companies, 1 headquarters company, 1 supply company, and 1 machine-gun company; that makes 15 altogether; and there are 16 officers——

Mr. HAY. That makes 12 extra officers in all.

Mr. KAHN. Two in the supply company—that makes 16.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the total enlisted force of the line of the Army shall not exceed at any one time 140,000, except as provided for in section 1 of this act.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, this being Saturday afternoon, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman withhold that until I can offer this amendment?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 13, line 12, by striking out the words "one hundred and forty" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Two hundred and twenty," and add at the end of the section the following: "That not exceeding 80,000 of the force provided in this section shall be distributed among the various arms of the service in such manner and in such proportion as the President may prescribe."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment? May I ask unanimous consent to speak for just two minutes?

Mr. HAY. I withhold the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, one of the most troublesome questions with which we are confronted in the Committee on Military Affairs is the question of promotion. When we reach section 11 we encounter the section that deals with promotion. When that section is reached I intend to offer an amendment, which makes promotions dependent upon the length of commissioned service and the usual examinations. I would like to have unanimous consent to print this amendment, which is a very brief one, in the RECORD, so that Members may see it and consider it before the committee takes up again the consideration of this bill.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Does that include merit or just length of service?

Mr. TILSON. In that regard it is just the same as we have now, length of service and the usual examination, except that now it is purely by seniority, so that an officer may be promoted without serving any time at all in a given grade if there is a vacancy in the grade above; but neither system considers the merit of the officer at all, except the usual examination, which is provided for by this amendment the same as the present section in the bill. I simply ask to have this amendment printed so that it may be seen and examined before the committee resumes consideration of the bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have it read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TILSON offers the following amendment: Strike out section 11 and insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 11. Subject to the examinations provided by law, the requirements of this act as to provisional appointments, and the exceptions provided by this act as to chaplains, dental surgeons, and officers of the Medical Corps, promotions among commissioned officers of the Regular Army shall take place on the completion of the following total years of service as a commissioned officer of the United States, to include service in the Regular Army, the Volunteers, the Navy, and the Marine Corps: Four years to the grade of first lieutenant, 12 years to the grade of captain, 21 years to the grade of major, 26 years to the grade of lieutenant colonel, and 30 years to the grade of colonel."

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that is merely read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. It is read for information.

Mr. TILSON. It is fair to state to the Members of the House that if the amendment just read should be adopted, I have ready a number of provisos relating to the Medical Corps, Dental Corps, and chaplains, which would be necessary to take proper care of these officers. Also other provisos which would be necessary to properly adjust such an amendment to the other parts of the bill. It seemed best not to include these until the body of the amendment is adopted, as they would probably only tend to obscure the real issue or prevent the amendment being read at all.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein the official copy of the instruction of the British Admiraly to British merchantmen, as made public by Mr. Polk to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an official copy of the orders of the British Admiralty to armed merchantmen, as given out by Mr. Polk, of the State Department, to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it very important to the gentleman that that go in to-day?

Mr. FESS. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I have been trying to keep a record touching this particular item of dispute. It is not necessary for it to go in to-day, only I would like to have it printed in the RECORD sometime. It was made public to-day, and I thought it would be proper to put it in to-day.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the matter, and do not know that I would have any objection if I had seen it.

Mr. FESS. I will withdraw the request to-day and pass the copy of the orders over to the gentleman. I would like to have the opportunity of putting it in the RECORD, because I am making a sort of a summary of all of this controversy.

Mr. GARRETT. I understand that the matter has been made public?

Mr. FESS. Yes; by the State Department.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House (at 3 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, March 20, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 20, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee still expressing in our prayer the longing of the universal heart. Whatever wealth of being Thou mayest give to us, whatever joy of life, whatever beauty of grace may be ministered unto us, our hearts are restless until they find their rest in Thee. Without Thee we can do nothing. Thou art the Author of all that abides. Thou art the inspiration of all that is high and ennobling in human life. Thou hast come into touch with men. Thou hast written the history of Thine own dealing with Thy people. Thou hast given to us the changeless law. Thou dost minister to us by the living spirit.

Grant us this day to perform the duties of the day in harmony with Thy will and in conformity to Thy law. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. SIMMONS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 8, 1916.

Resolution requesting Senators and Representatives from Kentucky in the Congress of the United States to support bills S. 4570 and H. R. 10277, now pending in Congress, to authorize the President to appoint Col. L. Mervin Maus to the grade of brigadier general in the United States Army and place him on the retired list.

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States Senate bill No. 4570 and House bill No. 10277, to authorize the President to appoint Col. L. Mervin Maus to the grade of brigadier general in the United States Army and place him on the retired list;

Whereas Col. Maus rendered conspicuous and distinguished services as the first commissioner of public health for the Philippine Islands in the eradication of bubonic plague from the city of Manila; in the suppression of a widespread epidemic of smallpox throughout the archipelago, which annually destroyed thousands of lives; in successfully combating Asiatic cholera which invaded the islands during his administration as commissioner of public health for the Philippines; in taking a census of the lepers of the archipelago and selecting an island for their segregation; in establishing provincial and municipal boards of health throughout the islands; and in making many radical changes among the natives, which materially improved their condition and saved thousands of lives annually;

Resolved by the House of Representatives of Kentucky, That the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, requested to support and use all honorable means to secure the passage of said bills.

Attest:

ELI BERRY,
Chief Clerk of House of Representatives.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Taylor, Dublin, De Leon, Desdemona, Dallas, and Fort Worth, all in the State of Texas, and of sundry citizens of Newtown, Pa., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present memorials signed by some 28,657 farmers in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called prison convict-labor bill. I ask that one of the memorials be read into the RECORD without the names, and that all the memorials be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The memorials were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and the body of one was read as follows:

Protest against legislation which would prevent the sale of products made in whole or in part by prison labor.

To the United States Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

It has been brought to the notice of the undersigned that certain bills are now pending in both Houses of Congress which not only forbid the interstate shipment and sale of articles produced by prison contract labor but which would also prevent the State from employing its prisoners in the manufacture of articles on State account.

This legislation, if passed, by restricting the field of sale, would practically eliminate the industries now operated on State account, in many penal institutions, enabling the large manufacturers of binder twine to monopolize the industry, deprive the farmers of the benefits of competition, increase the price of twine, and deprive the State of the income of this industry.

It was largely through the efforts of the farmers that the old plan of hiring out the inmates of penal institutions to contractors was abolished, but we do not believe that free men should be taxed to support inmates in idleness. We believe that inmates of penal institutions should be employed at useful, instructive, and profitable labor to compensate society for the loss and expense they have caused, to support their families, to effect real reform, and to teach them a useful occupation. The above-mentioned bills, by restricting the field of sales, would largely prevent such employment.

We therefore, the undersigned farmers, respectfully but earnestly protest against any law which will interfere with the shipment and sale in any market of articles produced by prison labor employed under State management.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota presented a petition of 141 citizens of Hot Springs, S. Dak., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Farmers' Local Union, of Ethan, S. Dak., remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Allegheny County and Westmoreland County, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to found the Government of the United States on Christianity, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 1741) for the relief of certain homestead entrymen for lands within the limits of the Glacier National Park, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 281) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1059. A bill to provide for the payment for certain lands within the former Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana (Rept. No. 279); and

S. 1065. A bill to provide for summer residence homesteads, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 280).

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1746) for the relief of Delilah Siebenaler, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 283) thereon.

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (S. 3257) for the relief of Johnston-McCubbins Investment Co., reported it without amendment.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Private Land Claims I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 1860) in reference to the issuance of patents and copies of surveys of private-land claims.

I submit a report (No. 284) to accompany the bill, and I ask that the letter from the Secretary of the Interior may be printed at the end of the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar, and the request of the Senator from Massachusetts will be complied with.

SUITS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CHILTON. Several bills have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary relative to the bringing of certain suits in the Supreme Court of the United States. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill in the nature of a substitute for these bills, which I ask may be received.

The bill (S. 5126) giving the consent of the United States for the bringing of certain suits in the Supreme Court of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. CHILTON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report the following bills and joint resolution adversely, and I ask that they be postponed indefinitely:

The bill (S. 902) giving the consent of the United States for the bringing of certain suits in the Supreme Court of the United States;

The bill (S. 4059) authorizing suits to be brought by any State or States against the United States of America; and

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 68) giving the consent of the United States for the State of Louisiana to institute suit against the United States in the Supreme Court of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bills and joint resolution will be postponed indefinitely.

DESERT-LAND ENTRIES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. WORKS. From the Committee on Public Lands, I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 4671) to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in Riverside County, Cal., and I submit a report (No. 282) thereon. It is a matter of some urgency, and I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Unless the bill is quite important, I want to object to the consideration of any matters this morning. The armor-plant bill will come up for final disposition at 4 o'clock to-morrow; a number of Senators desire to be heard on it; and it is hardly fair to the measure or to the Senators concerned to have these outside matters coming up at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. PENROSE. Unless the Senator——

Mr. WORKS. I suggest that it is a matter of importance and could nearly have been passed while the Senator has been speaking.

Mr. PENROSE. That may be, but I have a right to object.

Mr. WORKS. I can explain to the Senator——

Mr. PENROSE. It is explanations which are causing delay that I object to. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

MILITARY TRAINING IN CIVIL LIFE.

Mr. LODGE. I submit a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 139) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a statement to be prepared by The Adjutant General of the Army showing approximately the number of persons in the United States in civil life who have received a military training within the last 10 years, as follows:

1. Men who have served at least one full enlistment in the Regular Army.
2. Men who have served at least one full enlistment in the National Guard.
3. Graduates of educational institutions which provide an adequate military training.

Mr. WORKS. This resolution is offered by one of the Senators who are anxious to take up the bill that is now pending——

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing that the resolution shall go over.

Mr. WORKS. It will probably take up a good deal of time for discussion. Objection was made to an urgent bill that I asked to have considered because it would delay discussion on the armor-plate bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Let the resolution go over.

Mr. WORKS. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Let the resolution go over, Mr. President. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

NEEDS OF THE NAVY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, there is in the North American Review of this month a very interesting and, I think, instructive article, entitled "The Needs of Our Navy," by an expert. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD, if there is no objection. It is full of information, and I think will be a great help to the Senate in the consideration of proposed legislation that will soon come before us.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the article reflect on any Cabinet officer?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no. I have read every word of it, and there is no reflection on anybody. It discusses the proposed American naval program. It is by a leading British expert. The name of the Secretary of the Navy is mentioned in connection with it, but there is not a word that anyone could take offense at, and there is no reflection on anyone.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

THE NEEDS OF OUR NAVY AS PERCEIVED BY THE FOREMOST BRITISH EXPERT.

[By Arthur H. Pollen.]

Mr. Daniels's program is not an effort to produce a complete new Navy. It makes addition to an existing Navy. The ships commissioned and now in use will, nearly all of them, be essential portions of the Navy it is designed to have in 1922 or 1923. It is an admission that the existing Navy is deficient. Its promulgation is tantamount to saying, "We have not enough battleships, we have no battle cruisers, and we ought to have some. Our submarines, destroyers, and scout cruisers are too meager in numbers—too small and too weak in design." A new standard of naval strength is being set up. Certain obvious questions, then, arise for discussion. Are the additions now proposed to be made of the right sort? Are they being added in the right proportion? In other words, will the completed Navy, with these new units, be a symmetrical, well-balanced, efficient force? Finally, if the answers to these two questions are generally affirmative, viz, that the right types are being added and in the right proportion, will this new, symmetrical, well-balanced force be adequate for America's needs?

It is the last question that is the most important. It is the only one of which the lay public can judge adequately. Landsmen, however close and intelligent the interest they take in naval affairs, can only in exceptional instances understand all the complicated matters that have to be decided before any new type of ship is finally resolved upon. A large number will be capable of judging, if they have followed the course of the present war closely, of the sort of proportion that should exist between the capital units in a fleet and the light and subsidiary craft. But here again, to form a judgment of value, a close study of war and naval principle is indispensable. But whether the new Navy will suffice for America's needs, this any educated man can, with the right data before him, answer. To some extent, of course, the answer depends upon the answers to the first and second questions. It is proposed to spend half a billion dollars on completing the naval force. If the result of carrying out the proposed scheme should be a top-heavy or a lop-sided force, if by spending the money on better types of ship, or good types in a better proportion, a perfectly balanced force will result; then, though the proposed Navy might be inadequate, the more wisely selected force might suffice. But without pausing to consider this alternative let us push our inquiries as to the third question a little further.

The military power which a nation needs, either on land or on sea, is settled for it by its circumstances and its policy. If Great Britain lost command of the sea—that is, the certainty of being able to use it as the highroad of its supplies—the country holding an adverse command could impose its own terms of surrender on us in about six weeks' time. For practical purposes we should be starving. We should be utterly defeated by hunger or the threat of hunger in a far shorter period than it would take to organize an invading expeditionary force, to land it, and conquer even the smallest portion of our territory. Any country wishing to defeat Great Britain in war need, therefore, only follow the perfectly simple prescription of building and maintaining a navy that much more powerful than ours as will suffice to insure the British Navy's defeat. The fall of England follows automatically. To every Englishman, then, the answer to the question, "How strong a navy does Great Britain need?" has for some years been comparatively simple and plain. We look around the world, we note the general grouping of the powers, we calculate the naval strength of those likely to be opposed to us in war, and we provide a fleet adequate to engage the navies that might combine against us.

For example, at the beginning of 1914 we had of battleships and battle cruisers of the modern type 21 in commission, 5 due for completion during the year, 5 building, and 3 projected.

Germany, Austria, and Italy had of ships of the same class 18 built, 9 building, and 4 projected. Our total, therefore, was 34 ships against the 31 of the triple alliance. Could we have counted upon France as our ally, we could have added the whole of her fleet to our total. The Russian fleet, being confined to the Black Sea and the Baltic, would not have assisted us against the triple alliance. But even without French assistance we were in superior force to the whole of our possible enemies. Further, the conditions of the triple alliance being what they were, it had for some years been obvious that Italy would never join in a war of aggression waged by Germany and Austria against us, and it was quite certain that we should not force Italy to fight against us by declaring an aggressive war against her partners. Hence our superiority was easily greater than 34 to 31. And as some thousands of miles separated the home headquarters of Austria and Germany and as we were astride of the communications, our duty was really almost limited to maintaining an adequate balance against Germany.

Now, this was a matter on which the opinion of the men in the street was as good as that of the sailor statesman. In spite of much confused thinking and wrong-headed argument, the man in the street fully realized that command of the sea, in the last resort, must be won and held by the side that possessed the largest number of the strongest naval units. Both in the number of our capital ships and in the power of their armaments, we have been compelled by public opinion to maintain a high percentage of superiority over Germany. At the outbreak of war our superiority in numbers was 40 per cent; and comparing the striking power of these ships by the combined weights of a single broadside from each, our gunnery superiority was 60 per cent.

Has America in this matter any guide as unmistakable as was ours? Mr. Daniels's statement is quite silent on the subject. It is not a matter on which the foreigner gets very much enlightenment from such American writings, official or unofficial, as reach us on this side. And it is obviously not for him to suggest what the standard of American naval strength should be. And yet it looks like putting the cart before the horse to discuss the character and composition of the new Navy without knowing first what it is for. The fleet America needs is the fleet that its circumstances and policies require. It is clear that there is no choice in the matter. Either American circumstances and policy determine the strength of the Navy, or the strength of the Navy will determine American circumstances and policy. Put into plain English the words "circumstance and policy" mean this: From what powers do you expect trouble? Mr. GARDNER and the General Board seem in this matter to take quite a definite and intelligible line. They say that the American Navy should be equal to the most powerful which any other nation maintains. The most powerful navy is the British. It has maintained its standard of strength for purely defensive purposes. It has been built to prevent being altered, to Great Britain's disadvantage, the existing balance of power in the world. It stands to-day for the sanctity of international contract, for the liberty of small nations, for the right of Christendom to resist unscrupulous aggression, and the public denial of justice, humanity, and law. All these are fine things. The United States stands for them also. It would be to the world's benefit if they put themselves in a position to stand for them with effect. But, clearly, if it needs a navy up to the British standard to enable America to play Great Britain's rôle in this respect, then Mr. Daniels's program is utterly inadequate.

The strength, then, of the Navy that America requires must be dictated by the combined strength of the nations whose hostility to American policy and American ideals there is reason to fear. It is a question not for naval experts but for statesmen to settle. When it is settled, the equivalent of the Navy required may, to a great extent, be determined by arithmetic. Relative battleship strength is the first point, though it is not the only one. When a list has been made of the powers that may become enemy, add their battle fleets together, estimate what their strength is likely to be at any future date, and provide the battleship strength necessary for meeting it. With two final observations I shall leave this part of the subject. The General Board and Mr. GARDNER want a navy equal to the strongest maintained by any single power. If this is an intelligible, it is also a large and costly policy. But remember that it is not so costly as failure to have adequate naval strength when the time of trial comes. Secondly, if you want a successful naval war, provide a force at least 40 per cent greater than that you are likely to meet. If you want an exciting naval war, provide one which is approximately equal. But a navy which is smaller in numbers and less in power than that of the probable opponent is demonstrably worse than useless. It is useless because there seems no rôle at all for an inferior fleet. It neither protects nor enables you to attack. And it is worse than useless, because to possess a great fleet which is not great enough to fight successfully is a waste of treasure and effort and men in time of peace and a source of bitter humiliation in time of war.

Let us now pass to the second question. Does the new program provide a well-balanced fighting fleet? To discuss this we must take something in the program as a basis. And naturally we shall take the strength in capital ships, because, as we have seen, command of the sea ultimately depends upon these and upon no other form of naval force at all. Mr. Daniels proposes to build so that in 1922 or 1923 America will possess 27 battleships and 6 battle cruisers. What relation will the other fleet units bear to this force, judged first by the standard which the peace theory laid down as desirable, and next by that which war has shown to be vitally necessary? The other fleet units are cruisers and destroyers. Until recently cruisers have been of a score of heterogeneous types, ranging from 2,000 to 13,000 tons, with armaments running from 4-inch to 12-inch guns, and with speeds all the way from 19 to 30 knots. Expert analysis and criticism have long since shown that the armored cruiser is a bastard unit. It has neither the armament nor the protection of the battleship, nor the speed of the scout and the commerce protector. The career of Von Spee does, it is true, show that a squadron of such ships in the eastern Pacific, disposing of a broadside of twelve 8-inch guns, could detach from the main seat of war anything from four to six times its strength until that squadron was immobilized or destroyed. But this is the only instance in which the armored cruiser has influenced the war at all. No doubt every armored cruiser that Great Britain possesses has been commissioned and in use since the war began. But they have been little other than more costly and slower substitutes for the faster, lighter, and cheaper cruisers that do not exist.

In naval war there are two purposes which cruising ships fulfill. The first, which makes the greater demand upon their numbers and activities, is the protection of trade. But the second is hardly less important. The capacity to use fleets of capital ships with effect depends not entirely, but very largely, upon the degree to which the admiral is served with cruising ships. If there is one thing plainly written in the history of naval war, it is that scarcely ever have the admirals using the capital-ship squadrons had a sufficiency of lighter craft at their disposal. In our two great wars against Revolutionary France and Napoleon our admirals sent up an unending complaint of the deficiency of their equipments in this respect. Yet in 1793 we had 135 cruisers commissioned in the Royal Navy. By 1809 this number had risen to 684. In 1796 we had brought our ships of the line to over 100; we already had seven cruisers to each two ships of the line. But in 1809 the ships of the line had hardly increased at all. The proportion of cruisers then to capital ships had practically doubled. In the year of Trafalgar they were five to one. But so great were the demands of trade for protection that neither Nelson nor any of the fleet commanders had at any stage of the campaign a sufficiency of frigates.

What was the British Navy's standard of cruising strength before the war began? In 1914, as we have seen, the British Navy had, built and building, 34 capital ships of the first class. Again, built and building, we had 38 armored cruisers and 89 light cruisers, or 127 cruisers in all. Of these, 46 possessed a speed of between 19 and 21 knots, 32 had a speed of between 22 and 23 knots, 33 had a speed of from 24 to 26 knots, and 16—most of which were still building—had a designed speed of 30 knots. Thus the total ratio of cruisers to capital ships was a little less than four to one. Of slow and more powerful cruisers the ratio was about one and a half to one; of cruisers from 2 to 3 knots faster than the battleships, about one to one; of cruisers from 3 to 5 knots faster than the battleships, about the same; and of cruisers about 50 per cent faster than battleships, about one to two.

In a modern fleet the destroyers discharge, like cruisers, several functions. They can be used for scouting, for commerce protection, especially against submarines, for protection of battle fleets from submarines, and for the delivery of torpedo attacks on enemy fleets in action. Built and building, in 1914, we had 240 destroyers, or 7 to every capital ship. Thus, of all light craft put together, it is fairly accurate to say that for every 2 battleships we had 3 slow cruisers, 2 cruisers 10 per cent faster, 2 cruisers 25 per cent faster, 1, 50 per cent faster, and 14 destroyers. Of the destroyers, roughly one and a half were capable of a speed of 25½ to 27 knots, and the other half of a speed of 30 to 35 knots. How does Mr. Daniels's proposition of light craft to capital ships compare with this, which was Great Britain's peace standard?

The completed American Navy is to consist of 27 battleships, 6 battle cruisers, making 33 capital ships; 10 armored cruisers, 13 scout cruisers, 5 first-class cruisers, 3 second-class cruisers, and 10 third-class cruisers—a total of 41 cruising craft. Of destroyers there will be 108. The proportion of cruisers to capital ships, then, instead of coming up to the British standard of approximately 4 to 1, would actually be less than 1.25 to 1, and the proportion of destroyers to battleships, instead of being 7 to 1, would be a little less than 3½ to 1.

If, then, the British peace standard was right, there will be a deficiency in the American Navy of nearly 120 cruisers and 100 destroyers. It may be quite truly objected that more than one-third of the British cruisers were either of obsolete types, like the armored cruisers, or of a speed which modern conditions make almost useless—that is, of less than 22 knots. It can be urged with justice that 20 fast cruisers would probably more than do the work of these 46 slow ones. But if this is said, then I must object that 28 of the 41 American cruisers would be in exactly the same case. And if these are obsolete already, they will not be less démodés five or six or seven years hence. Of the British cruisers, after all, 32 had a speed of from 22 to 23 knots, and 33 a speed of from 24 to 26 knots; 16 were designed for 30 knots. So far as I know, against these 81 cruisers of over 22 knots, America in 1925 will possess only 13.

But a comparison of the proposed American Navy with what was the peace standard of the British Navy does not state the case against Mr. Daniels's program as strongly as it can be stated. All instructed naval opinion in England had for many years proclaimed that the ratio of fast light craft to battleships had been allowed to sink to dangerously low proportions. The 16 30-knot cruisers laid down only just before the war were a belated effort to conciliate this very damaging criticism. The extent to which we have suffered in the war from the lack of cruisers of this type can be judged from the following facts: From the outbreak of war to the present moment, so far as is known, not a single German cruiser has left its home ports and joined any squadron abroad, or been able to put itself upon the high seas. At the outbreak of war the Leipzig, Emden, and Nürnberg were with Von Spee in the Eastern Pacific; the Dresden and Karlsruhe were in the neighborhood of Mexico or the West Indies; the Bremen was in the Atlantic; the Königsberg was in the Indian Ocean. A few armed merchantmen were ready for work on the South American trade routes. Of the cruisers the Dresden and two armed merchantmen prolonged their existence by taking refuge in the tangled waterways just above Cape Horn. The first was destroyed. The armed merchantmen interned themselves. The Karlsruhe ended mysteriously. The Königsberg was driven up the Rufigi. Only the Emden, Leipzig, Nürnberg, Dresden, and Cap Trafalgar were brought to action. Between them they inflicted damage on British shipping by direct capture of not less than £6,000,000 sterling. Had Von Spee detached the Leipzig, Nürnberg, and Dresden from his squadron the first moment he sighted the battle cruisers in Port Stanley, Heaven knows how long it would have taken before all three of them had been immobilized or sunk, or what damage they might still have done. And the damage they did is not to be measured only by the ships and cargoes they captured and destroyed. The cost of underwriting, and hence the cost of freights from South America to Europe, were gravely affected. The total cost of these cruisers to us can hardly be placed at a lower figure than £8,000,000 sterling. It is a sum that might have been reduced by half or more. Four million pounds would have given us a round dozen of cruisers better armed and faster than any of these. They might have ended the Karlsruhe and Emden before their depredations had gone far. And these would have been of incalculable war value apart from completing this particular job. It is only a single instance that goes to prove that the ratio of nonbattleship strength to battleship strength, instead of being too high, was undoubtedly too low in the British Navy.

The deficiency of fast light craft became still more evident when the rude experience of war wakened our Admiralty up to the fact that it had entirely failed to provide adequate protection against submarines. Before the submarine attack on trade began, the objectives of these much discussed and little understood units of naval force were the ships of the Royal Navy and the transports plying between England and France. No unit of the first importance of the Royal Navy was successfully attacked by submarines at all. And almost no unit of any importance amongst the transports was hit or damaged. Of the warships that were lost, hardly one fell in conditions that would have seemed permissible had the capacity of the submarine to attack fleets been adequately analyzed before war began. When the three Cressys, the Hermes, Hawke, and Niger had been sunk, the principles of defense came to be better understood. In effect, our 240 destroyers proved adequate for the maintenance of the requisite flotillas for dealing with the German fleet if it came out, and for the protection of the fleet and the transports. But when the attack on trade began there was no margin available. I can not then doubt, supposing that we lumped all the cruisers and destroyers together, and say that we possessed at the beginning of the war a proportion of about 11 other craft to each battleship, that that proportion was far too low. It was too low because so large a number of the units had not the speed requisite for modern conditions. But apart altogether from this, had the provision been 50 per cent higher, it would not have been excessive. The saving in the protection of trade might more than have equaled the outlay necessary to provide it.

As a criticism, then, of Mr. Daniels's program, one is tempted to suggest that its weakest point is the inadequacy of its light craft, and certain special conditions arising out of the naval situation in America seem to lend additional point to this criticism. The naval enemies of Great Britain could both of them be cooped up. Within one hour of the declaration of war the German Navy was completely blocked in, and the Austrian Navy no less. But if America finds herself in a naval war it will be quite impossible for her to slam the door of the fleets hostile to her with the promptitude and completeness with which these two doors were slammed by us. Her enemies will be able to put everything afloat to sea before she can turn a screw to stop them. The only difference between our case and yours is that the British sea trade is much greater. But that, after all, touches only part of the case. And it should be added that the United States has a coast line almost incalculably greater than ours, and she may have to fight on two fronts and not on one only. It would seem, then, if the ratio of light craft to battleships was too low at 11 to 1 in the British Navy, and should have been 15 to 1, the ratio of America would certainly not be much too high at the latter figure, and should certainly not fall short of the former.

And now to the first of my questions: Is Mr. Daniels proposing to add the right kind of units to the American Navy? This is rather difficult to discuss without going into a series of technical matters which perhaps the majority of readers of The North American Review might find tedious. But certain things leap to the eye. It is noticeable, for instance, that the cost of the unit battleship is to be $18,800,000. The cost of the Iron Duke, the flagship of the Grand Fleet, was under $10,000,000; the cost of our battle cruisers of contemporary design, that is the Lion and Queen Mary, was approximately equal to that of the Iron Duke. The American battle cruisers, I observe, are to cost $17,500,000, or $1,300,000 less than the dreadnaughts. When all allowance is made for the increased cost of material, these seem to be prodigious figures, and one supposes that this great increase in cost must reflect some great increase in size, protection, armament, and speed. It has been stated here that the Bureau of Construction and Repair does not propose to adopt a bigger gun. It seems incredible that a greater number of guns should be put into the new battleships than is already put into the latest class which America is building. Where, then, is the extra money going? Greater speed, of course, is costly, and greater armor protection still more costly, because it adds to the size and strength of hull and increases the power necessary to attain to any given speed. Do the events of the war make any case for increasing the speed and protection of battleships? Surely not. There has been no fleet engagement, and the only time that dreadnaughts met, viz, when Sir David Beatty chased the German battle cruisers across the North Sea, the circumstances were in no way parallel to those of previous fleet actions, nor do they suggest anything that is likely to recur. Undoubtedly they advertised speed, but they threw little light on the question of armor. The naval constructor, then, must be in a difficulty. No one knows from experience whether higher speeds will prove of value when both sides want to fight—whether larger guns are worth the sacrifices they extort, whether thicker armor is a necessity. All one can say with confidence is that so far very little new light has been thrown on the principles which have governed battleship construction to the present time.

In 1913 the British Admiralty decided to arm our new capital ships with the 15-inch guns instead of the 13.5. It was an advance in projectile weight from 1,400 pounds to approximately 2,000. It involved a diminution in the number of guns carried. What the arguments were on which this change was brought about the British public has not been told. The only information it has on this subject is exceedingly disquieting. It is that the experts disagreed and that it fell to Mr. Churchill to decide this knotty point himself. It was he, and not the seamen, who had settled the matter. In his farewell speech in the House of Commons he informed us of this staggering fact, as if the rightness of the decision could be taken for granted. He entirely failed to perceive that the fact that it was a lay decision was almost conclusive as to its being wrong.

From almost every point of view it seems bad policy to diminish the number of guns that a capital ship carries. There is only one argument to counterbalance the objection. The heavier the shell, the flatter the trajectory and the greater the constancy or accuracy of the gun at great ranges. The standard of exactness in knowledge of range is determined by the flatness of trajectory. If to hit with a 6-inch gun at 12,000 yards you must know the range within 40 yards, to hit with a 15-inch gun you need not know it more nearly than to 150 or 200 yards. In other words, you may be allowed an error four or five times as great and yet hit. But more than this, the 15-inch gun will probably make three times as high a proportion of hits to rounds fired as the smaller weapon at this range. If the 15-inch gun was preferred on the ground that a higher standard of marksmanship could more easily be obtained with it than with the 13.5, then there was a good military reason for preferring it. But there would have to be something in the ease of obtaining the higher standard of markmanship to compensate for the loss of volume of fire.

Most landsmen—and some seamen—judge of naval weapons not by what they can do in practice but by what they are in theory. They are more impressed by the torpedo than by the gun, because a torpedo strikes a ship under water, while the gun strikes it above water, and they know that the damage inflicted by the smallest torpedo may be much greater than that effected by the largest shell. And as between different sizes of guns they conclude that the bigger the shell and the greater the range to which it carries, the more effective the gun must be. They ignore the only thing worth remembering. It is that guns are made to hit with. Unless a larger gun promises more hits it is not worth changing.

There is, then, so far as the public knows, no reason for supposing that if American seamen stick to the 14-inch rifle they are making any mistake in so doing. It is possible that the 15-inch would give better results at ranges from 16,000 to 19,000 yards. But surely inside those ranges the difference would not be material. Probably the cost in the increase of capital ships is mostly due to an increase in speed. High speed is of undoubted value. But it is of less value if it is in a few ships of the fleet and not in all. It might not be worth raising the price to obtain only this. But the choice in speed, like the choice in the size of guns, is emphatically a matter for experts to decide. It will be dangerous if public opinion pushes them to larger and costlier ships, if this leads to a diminution of numbers in seeking a higher standard of individual power.

The most interesting features in the American program are the battle cruisers, the 10 scout cruisers, and the submarines. With regard to the type of battle cruisers what has been said in the matter of battleships applies still more strongly here. If you are likely to engage an enemy that possesses this form of craft, it is necessary for you to possess them too. But the ships must be individually faster and more powerful. If they are not, you may be just as well without them. The battle cruiser, really, is a luxury of the rich power. Germany's battle cruisers have been perfectly useless to her. They made a certain amount of sport for Sir David Beatty a year ago, but they have never, in the North Sea, attempted and have never achieved any military result of the least importance. The only battle cruiser that has done good service to Germany was the Goeben, that dodged the British squadrons in the Mediterranean and brought Turkey into the war, and she should have been sunk long before she reached the Dardanelles. The four left in home waters might just as well never have been built. Indeed, had Germany constructed five dreadnought battleships to take their place, the outlay would have been about the same—for over here the fast battle cruisers cost at first more than dreadnaughts—and she would be in a far better naval position. For the war opened with our having 22 dreadnaughts in commission, and had Germany preferred battleships to battle cruisers, she might have had 21. Her chances in a fleet action would have been much better if our superiority in capital ships had been represented solely by a single battleship and the four battle cruisers that were in home waters.

Of the proposed scout cruisers, what strikes one most—as in the case of battleships—is their enormous cost: $5,000,000 each! The latest British type of light cruiser, the Arethusa and Calliope, displace 3,800 and 3,520 tons each, according to the publications given out before the war. Their cost has not been published. But I should be surprised if either type exceeded $2,000,000. The weakness of these ships is their armament—three and two 6-inch guns and six 4-inch. The ideal light cruiser armament would appear to be five or six 6-inch guns. No gun that is any smaller gives sufficient results—as is shown by the fact that the German 4-inch shells never did any harm to those of our ships that have engaged them. But, on the other hand, it is bad policy to increase the weight and size of the ship unduly. Speed and high speed are of course badly wanted, but when it comes to $5,000,000 a ship it looks as if the new scout cruisers would be more like the armored cruisers of a former date—unduly fast, or unduly armed, or unduly armored. To do this is to fall into the error of sacrificing numbers to speed and strength. The cruiser is primarily a scout and commerce protector. If its strength and speed are adequate for meeting enemy cruisers, it is all that is needed. And for this a 6-inch gun should suffice. Surely it would be better economy in this particular to spend the money on larger numbers. For, as we have seen already, it is the numbers of fast craft that is the most conspicuous lack in the program as it stands. As to destroyers we have no details, but here again speed, radius of action, and armament are all vital factors.

The most questionable element in the American program is the very large provision of submarines. Fifty fleet submarines and 85 coast submarines, which are to cost in all nearly $80,000,000, make a vast hole in the half billion that it is proposed to spend. As it is in many respects the most striking, so in another it is the most difficult item to criticize. The special circumstances of this war and the very extraordinary circumstances which preceded it, have given the submarine an entirely false importance in the public eye. Essentially the submarine is a variant of the destroyer. Once within attacking range of an enemy it has what the destroyer has not, the power of delivering a daylight attack, remaining itself almost unseen. But invisibility is not a new attribute. The torpedo boat and the destroyer possessed it at night. Their speed enabled them to deliver the equivalent of unseen attack in the dusk. Except that the submarine's invisibility is more complete, it is the destroyer's inferior. It has less speed, it is less strongly armed.

But its invisibility does give it a function new to naval war. It has the capacity to pass through waters which are absolutely commanded by surface ships—because it can pass them submerged and unseen. Fleets otherwise powerless to enter commanded waters can now enter them with this form of craft. Thus the German submarines have been at large to a limited extent in the English Channel, and with extraordinary freedom in the North Sea, in the western Atlantic, and in the Mediterranean. They have gone, in point of fact, where no German surface ship could have gone at all. British submarines similarly have penetrated the Sea of Marmora and the Baltic. The first and most striking fact about the submarine, then, is its capacity to enter into and operate in waters that are adversely commanded.

But once in those waters the power of the submarine is extraordinarily limited. Indeed, its capacity to enter those waters can also be limited. The use of nets, of mines, and of patrols—especially when assisted by aircraft—these at any focal point which submarines coming or going must pass, can do much to obstruct their free passage. The narrower the waters, the easier their control by these means. And even in comparatively open waters great destruction can be and has been done by surface craft upon them.

But, apart altogether from the dangers to which the submarine is exposed, what is its value when it is at work in hostile waters? It has two weapons, the torpedo and the gun. It can carry but few torpedoes—few, that is, compared with the number of rounds of gun ammunition that it can stow away. The torpedo, too, is an uncertain weapon at the best of times, particularly uncertain when aimed while the submarine is submerged. Wherever it is possible, then, the captain of the submarine has done his work with his guns. But as a gunned ship the submarine is the weakest thing afloat. Hence its guns can be used only against unarmed craft. It dare not approach any armed ship on the surface at all. If it has to approach an armed ship submerged, its speed of approach is greatly limited. The highest submerged speed does not exceed the half-power speed of the slowest warship. Hence high speed and a high standard of vigilance in ships which are armed makes them altogether immune from submarine attack except in the rare cases when, by pure chance, their course takes them within the submarine's striking radius. It was thus, it is supposed, that the Formidable was destroyed on New Year's Day, 1915. It was thus that the Lusitania fell—if the fact that she was within a yard or two of the course she had taken every time she had ever crossed the Atlantic can be described as chance and not as folly. The point, however, is that if the ship is armed the submarine must keep submerged, and if it keeps submerged its maneuvering speed is low, its capacity to get within striking distance very limited, and its weapon very uncertain. If the ship it intends to strike is both at speed and accompanied by destroyers or fast craft, the area of danger to the submarine and the intensity of the vigilance are increased, and the danger from submarines becomes altogether negligible.

The success of the submarine against the merchantman is to be explained by the fact that merchantmen being unarmed, the submarine has been able to deal with them as any other armed surface ships would do. The speed of the modern big submarine is higher than that of any but a score or so of the fastest liners, and a single 12-pounder is quite sufficient armament to subdue a merchantman if the merchantman is unarmed itself. If submarine attacks on trading ships become recognized as legitimate by civilized nations, then all merchantmen will be armed, and their case will approximate that of the warship.

But the most remarkable failure of the submarine in this war is its incapacity to do the one thing which even those who thought least of its capacity took for granted. It has entirely failed in its function of coast defense. The German submarines have been unable to defend either the ports of France, the coast of Gallipoli, Salonika, Valona, or the coast of Egypt from the allied battleships and transports. The explanation is simple. It has not been able to interfere with the transport and disembarkation of troops, because these operations have been carried out in waters superficially controlled by the fleet to which the transports belonged. What the submarine could do in defending a coast in waters superficially controlled by its own side will probably never be proved. These are not the conditions in which intending invaders send their armies across the sea. Had the Germans been mad enough to try to land a force in England, I have no doubt that British submarines, acting without any fear whatever of destroyers or other fast craft, could have accounted easily for every transport that got past our battleships, our cruisers, and our destroyers. But I have, if it is permissible to say so, still less doubt that any transports would ever have got past!

The root of the matter seems to be this: If you command the seas with surface craft, the rôle of the enemy submarine is limited to being a somewhat inefficient guerilla. It can waylay peaceful merchantmen, just as the highwaymen of old in England held up travelers and "bad" men in America have occasionally held up trains. But it has not taken any such toll of British shipping as the privateers took in olden days, and, like the privateers, it has been absolutely incapable of interfering with military communications where the surface is efficiently commanded. In this matter the British submarines have entirely eclipsed the German. Both in the Sea of Marmora and in the Baltic our successes against transports have often been greater in a single week than the German submarines' against our transports in the whole campaign.

A foolish and most unfortunate statement of the British Admiralty in January, 1915, had attributed to submarines an importance that they never possessed. It was said that the British fleet desisted from the attack on the Germans at the Dogger Bank because of the presence of underwater craft. I am persuaded that no British admiral could ever have made this excuse—and survived. If enemy submarines are observed at sea, it will no doubt be necessary to avoid passing within range of them. But a suddenly discovered mine field or a well-planned torpedo attack from destroyers each would have exactly the same effect. It would impose upon the commander of a battleship squadron a sudden and, perhaps, a large and violent change of course, but it would be no excuse for flight. If such an excuse were admitted, it would be tantamount to saying that submarines could sweep the sea.

What is the application of these considerations to the American program? I suggest that the principles to bear in mind are these: The more certain you are of commanding the sea against your adversaries, the more useless submarines will be to you. If you command the seas, you will not want them for coast defense. If you do not command the seas, they will not defend your coasts. They will not help to win command of the sea. You will hardly want them for attacking the enemy's trade, for you are too far from the focal points of any enemy's trade to be able to maintain submarines upon them.

Take it for all in all, I suggest—while Mr. Daniels's program shows no sign of the idiotic absurdities about submarines that have been put forward on this side—that, nevertheless, it has been influenced by the great effect the submarine has had on the public and professional imagination. And this leads me to my concluding point.

It is impossible to get any large change of policy carried in this country unless public opinion is instructed and educated in the issues and principles involved. The same conditions no doubt prevail in America, and may prevail to a still greater extent. But it must be remembered that the details of naval programs are not fit matter to be settled by public acclamation. The scale of the program is certainly so. The objects for which the navy is to be built are so, but the details manifestly are not. If the American statesmen and the American public can agree together as to the standard of strength that their Navy ought to attain, there is only one sound way of insuring that that strength is attained and at the smallest sacrifice. It is to leave the details to be decided by the best expert opinion that your Navy can produce. Remember that you want experts on a great many subjects. Remember also that to put yourselves into the hands of an individual expert is not the only way, and seldom the best way, to secure the best results. The general knowledge of a great service like the American Navy is more extensive, and its judgment is saner, than that of any single man, however gifted he may be. Remember, too, that the criticisms of those who use the things that are provided is far more valuable than the suggestions of those that make them. The program is quite silent as to expenditure on methods, and yet the methods of using weapons are of far vaster moment than the size or power or cost of the weapons themselves. The provisions of a navy is certain to be bungled if it is not guided by the best strategical and tactical brains you have. And the strategical brains will be misled unless they have mastered tactics, and the study of tactics can not begin until the art of using weapons has been brought to perfection.

If the occasion of a great naval program were made the occasion for organizing a well-proportioned naval staff—not a staff for executive administration, but one for dealing with all naval problems from the point of view of right theory and scientific practice—then a result would be produced far greater and more valuable than can be got by any mere provision of inert and costly things. It is, after all, on the men, and not on the ships, that you rely. See that they have the ships, guns, methods, plans, preparations, training that they ask for.

ARTHUR H. POLLEN.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR OWEN (S. DOC. NO. 361).

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I ask that an address by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Democracy of New Hampshire, delivered at Concord, N. H., March 16, 1916, be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I give notice that to-morrow morning, March 21, I shall, after the routine morning business, address the Senate in opposition to the armor-plant bill, being Senate bill 1417.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Friday next, the 24th instant, at the close of the morning business, I shall address the Senate upon Senate bill 4840, and in that connection I shall discuss the subject of national defense.

M'CLINTIC-MARSHALL CONSTRUCTION CO. (H. DOC. NO. 906).

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on February 25 the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] presented to the Senate the report of Maj. Gen. Goethals on the claim of the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co. and asked that it be printed as a document. That was agreed to. Maj. Gen. Goethals was required by law to transmit this report to Congress, which he did not do, as will be seen by his letter to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], in which he says:

> It was not understood by me that I was required also to transmit a copy of this report to the President of the Senate.

It appears now that the letter of Gen. Goethals transmitting the report is addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The printing clerk has no authority to change this, and it is not usual to print as a Senate document matter addressed to the Speaker of the other House. Last Saturday the House ordered the report to be printed and referred. That being the case, and in view of the situation, Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the order of the Senate was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. OLIVER. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. OLIVER. On account of delay in action by the other House, I wanted to make sure that this report would be printed. As a matter of fact, I think under the act of Congress Gen. Goethals should have sent the report to the President of the Senate as well as to the Speaker of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about that, Mr. President; but Gen. Goethals did not do so. Now that the House has ordered the report printed, it is unnecessary for the Senate to print it, and I therefore have asked for a reconsideration of the vote by which that was ordered.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, we can not hear on this side of the Chamber the request of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Gen. Goethals, under the law, was required to transmit to Congress the report on the claim of the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co. He transmitted it to the Speaker of the House but not to the President of the Senate. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] asked, on the 25th of February, that the report be printed as a document. In looking up the letter from Maj. Gen. Goethals it was found that his letter was addressed to the Speaker of the House, and last Saturday the House ordered that the report be printed. I am simply asking now that the vote by which the report was ordered to be printed in the Senate be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the report was ordered to be printed will be reconsidered. Are there concurrent or other resolutions? If there be none, morning business is closed.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I see by the calendar that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] has given notice that he would address the Senate to-day on the question of the proposed Government armor plant. It was my intention, if I could secure recognition, to follow him. As he is not now present, however, I shall be very glad to speak at this time on that question, for the time is very short before we reach the period fixed by the Senate for a vote.

Mr. President, this matter of an armor plant is one of very great importance, not merely on account of the money involved, for the initial appropriation is $11,000,000, which I think will be largely wasted; but also because, in my opinion, the adoption of this measure by Congress will create a situation which is extremely likely to paralyze for a time the construction of our great armored vessels. I therefore feel that no excuse is needed for addressing the Senate upon the subject and going into some details in regard to it.

The only arguments in its favor that have been advanced—there may be other arguments and reasons of which I know nothing—the only arguments that have been advanced are that the armor-plate makers are robbers and that we shall save money to the Government by putting the Government into the business. It is very easy to call people robbers. I have not much faith in calling names and using epithets and indulging in personal abuse. It has always seemed to me that it is a form of argument which leaves something to be desired.

I think we especially should hesitate to indulge in mere invective, for we know with what injustice that kind of argument is often applied to Congress itself. I have heard it said and I have seen it stated more than once in print in the newspapers that Senators and Representatives who were laboring to get public buildings for desirable villages in this country, or appropriations for stagnant creeks and river beds that require wells perhaps to supply them with water, who were struggling for navy yards in places where no navy yards were needed, and for Army posts, perhaps, and other public enterprises of that kind—I have heard them referred to in the newspaper press as robbers. We know how unjust that is, of course, and what excellent motives influence Senators and Representatives who are laboring to secure appropriations of that character. Therefore, I think we should hesitate before we set down as robbers men who are engaged in a perfectly legitimate business, who I think it can be shown, have made but little money out of the business, and who are furnishing armor to the United States at a lower price than armor is furnished in any foreign country.

I do not expect that anything I can say will have the slightest effect upon those who think that it is desirable to put the Government into the manufacturing or transportation business for the mere sake of having the Government in business, and who, with that generous spirit which is frequently exhibited when we are dealing with the Treasury of the United States, regard it as a mean and groveling objection to say that inferior government manufacturing is going to cost the United States a great deal of money. With those who hold this view of the desirability of putting the United States into every form of business, of course no argument on the ground of economy or the best methods of production will be of avail; but I think that to the great majority of both Houses as well as to the people at large the question of the best and most economical method of supplying the Government's wants is of importance. Therefore, I desire to consider the manufacture of armor, what we are getting now, and what we may expect if we destroy the private producers and substitute a Government production.

In the first place, let me say that there is no question by anybody as to the quality of the armor now furnished. There is no better armor furnished to any government than is furnished to ours. This narrows the question to the point of whether the present practice is the best method of securing the armor.

I desire, first, to call attention to the fact that the armor plate for naval use is an entirely different question from any other article which the Government either buys or makes itself. No one can question, I think, that it is sound policy to have navy yards, and not leave the Government dependent upon private yards, but by having navy yards we do not exterminate the private yards, because they have other business. The same is true of the manufacture of powder; the same is true of many other articles, some of which are made in Government shops; cartridges, for instance, and small arms; but with armor plate there is only one customer; there is not, and never can be, any general commercial demand for the article.

In the other articles that are made by the Government where the private production is not ended by the Government entering into the field, we preserve that elasticity of production which is so essential in the manufacture of war materials; that is, we are able, if war comes, greatly to increase our production through the private industries which are not dependent on Government production, but which can be enlarged easily at any time when stress comes. That is not the case with armor plate. If we establish a Government plant, private makers will go out of the business, and we shall be left with what is practically an inelastic and inexpansive source of supply.

The Secretary of the Navy in his annual report recommended an armor plant to be constructed by the Government capable of turning out 10,000 tons a year. The bill reported by the committee is more intelligent because it provides for 20,000 tons a year; but even 20,000 tons will not meet the requirements of the Navy if we enlarge our program or in time of stress, and if we are to build an armor plant we must make up our minds to incur the great expense of building a plant sufficient to meet all possible needs, because there will be absolutely no elasticity to it, and when war comes the enlargement of the production would be out of the question within any reasonable time.

The existing armor plants came into existence through the encouragement and suggestion of the Government. It is said that they have charged unfair prices, and that point I am about to consider; but on the general proposition of the best method of getting armor, I will quote Admiral Strauss, who has been the principal witness on whom the committee and the Department have relied for support for the Government plant, as to what he says in regard to private manufacturers. In his testimony before the committee Admiral Strauss said:

> If the private firms will furnish armor at a fair profit and will continue to do so under all conditions, I see no especial advantage in the Government going into the business. It all depends on what a fair profit is.

Now, as to the question of cost and profit. According to the report submitted by the chairman of the committee, armor plate should be produced for $262.79 a ton, with a plant operating at its full capacity. That is based entirely on ideal conditions of operation, some of which are obviously impossible. The actual manufacturing cost of producing armor is given, as I have just said, at $262.79 a ton at full capacity; but the Government plant will not be employed at full capacity to begin with, which at once increases the cost of production.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the estimated cost of $262 a ton, or whatever the figures are, include overhead charges?

Mr. LODGE. No; I am coming to that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. LODGE. That is the bare factory cost, nothing else, and it is based on the theory that the plant is running full all the time, which never has been the case with private plants. They never have had more than a third of their capacity of production used by the Government, and the five-year building program probably only keeps the plant busy to about two-thirds of its capacity.

Taking still further the Government's figures of $262 factory cost, we must first remember that since that estimate was made there has been a great advance in prices. That is admitted. It was admitted in the hearings. There is no question about it. It is admitted by the department. A very conservative addition would be 10 per cent over the cost of $262. That would make our armor plate cost now $289.07 a ton, as the pure factory cost. But the administrative and general expenses, taxes, insurance, interest, and depreciation are entirely omitted. Of course those things have to be considered in a private business. They are not considered in the Government business, but they are not escaped because they are not considered. They are not removed because we can juggle with the Government accounts and costs. Somebody pays all those overhead charges. All must be met, and met out of the Treasury; that is, out of the taxes paid by all the people. The effort is to make the people think that they will get armor plate cheaper by giving only the factory cost, which is pure deception.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator might also refer to a very important item which is not covered in this estimate, and that is the machinery and equipment which goes into the scrap heap as the result of the rapid and continual improvement in armor-plate-making processes. I remember seeing at Bethlehem some 20 years ago a hammer, I believe it was called, an enormous structure in the middle of a great shed, that cost a million dollars, and was out of commission almost before it was completed. Those enormous losses which go into the scrap heap are not covered in these estimates.

Mr. LODGE. What the Senator from Pennsylvania says is, of course, absolutely true. That is one of the additional charges not figured in these factory costs. The factory cost which is given by the Government, which will be $289 now, is absolutely misleading. It is like many other Government figures of costs. They put in their labor costs and leave out all the other costs that have to be met by private industry, and those costs are paid by the taxpayers and taken out of the Treasury. They are there, just the same.

If we add those charges which are unavoidable with any private corporation, we reach an estimated cost, including the overhead charges, taxes, insurance, repairs, and depreciation, of $387.82 a ton. The Bethlehem Steel Co. offers now, if it can have a five-year contract on the five-year program from the Government, which will secure its production during that period, to supply the armor at $395 a ton. It is now being furnished, according to the last contracts, at $425. The profit at either figure is very moderate—in the former case very small.

Mr. CURTIS. How long ago was that?

Mr. LODGE. That was for the armor furnished to the two new ships. I am going to show now how that compares with the prices paid by other Governments. I have the tables here. I want to get the exact figures for the different countries. I am reading from the Navy Yearbook:

Japan, $490 a ton for turret armor and $490 a ton for Krupp side armor.
Austria, $729 for turret armor and $511 for Krupp side armor.
Italy, $444 for turret armor and $405 for Krupp side armor.
Germany, $490 for Krupp side armor.
France, $598 for turret armor and $460 for Krupp side armor.
England, $691 for turret armor and $503 for Krupp side armor.
Russia, $510 for turret armor and $368 for Krupp side armor.
The United States, $496 for turret armor and $425 for Krupp side armor.

The price of turret armor has since then been reduced, as I understand, to $425 per ton.

The amount paid by the United States is the lowest of any except Italy.

An interesting thing to be considered is that the only Government plant that we know about is in Japan. The others are all private plants in every other country in the world, and I shall have something to say about that later. We know how much cheaper labor is in Japan than it is in this country. Japanese armor costs $490 a ton against the $425 that we are now paying, so it is evident that the Government plant in Japan has not lowered the cost of armor; but I suppose the explanation of the difference between the Japanese cost and the cost which we are told we shall have from a Government plant is that the Japanese figures are honest figures and cover everything. I think that is the real explanation.

I want now to say something about armor-plate making to explain the costs.

The making of armor plate is a secret process. The men in charge of the work are highly paid officers, specialists, scientists of the great steel companies which make many things besides armor plate. The superintendent at Midvale, I think, in charge of the armor-plate manufacturing, gets $15,000 a year. That is the type of men they have to employ for these important manufactures. The Government, of course, can not get these men. They will not give up their positions for anything the Government can offer. The Government will have to train such men itself.

The workmen at these plants are all part of the general organization. They are kept in employment throughout the year because the product of all the armor plants is a varied product. They have many other branches in which they can employ their men and maintain their organizations when the armor-plant production is not being made.

During the committee hearings it was asked of one of the naval officers who were present—I do not recall now which one, but I can find it—who would be supplied by the Navy for making armor at once. He replied that the department had one young lieutenant who had enjoyed some experience in the Washington Navy Yard, and a chemistry specialty, not mentioned.

I will also read from the testimony a little colloquy which occurred, which shows the difficulty and the intricacy of the manufacture:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, as to this proposition for a 20,000-ton plant, the estimate of cost is based upon its running all the while—three shifts. It is not customary to run Government plants 24 hours a day. Therefore, unless there is an emergency, we could reduce the time of manufacturing armor to eight hours a day, and jog along in that way, and the cost would not be as much as we are now paying.

That is the committee theory of conducting armor manufacturing.

Mr. BARBA.—

Who represented the Midvale Co.

It is not possible, Mr. Chairman, to run an armor plant eight hours a day. It is not physically possible.

Mr. GRACE.—

Representing the Bethlehem Co.

The operation require continuous work.

Mr. BARBA. The operations require absolutely continuous performance 24 hours a day 7 days a week.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the heat has to be maintained?

Mr. BARBA. Yes, sir. I instanced a week ago in my testimony one operation, which is common to every armor plant, which requires from 18 to 25 days' continuous operation at a temperature of 2,000° F. without cessation. You can not do that on an 8-hour basis.

The CHAIRMAN. That is one of the special parts of the manufacture, however.

Mr. BARBA. You can do that in the case of machines where the tools may stand idle.

The CHAIRMAN. My judgment would be it would be possible for the Government armor factory to run on those processes which are not necessarily continous in such a way as not to make it necessary, and you could get the same results, and you could expand and run 24 hours a day in an emergency.

Mr. BARBA. But, Senator Tillman, where does your cost go under such an operation as that? When you are working 8 hours a day and the plant is idle 16 hours a day, everything stops more than 16 hours a day. It takes longer than 8 hours a day to pick up and get going. You need a little manufacturing experience, Senator, to show you the truth of these statements I am making to you.

I have here a letter, which I am going to read to the Senate, from a man who has now no connection whatever with an armor plant, but who was employed for many years in one of the armor plants, and who has no interest whatever in them. He now has a position in my State. I think it is a very interesting letter and well worthy of the consideration of the Senate. It is dated Worcester, Mass., February 15, 1916:

DEAR SIR: I have been much interested in the recent hearings relating to the proposed establishment of a Government plant for the manufacture of armor plate.

I was employed for four years by one of the concerns now engaged in that trade, and for much of this time I was intimately connected with armor-plate work. My connection was with the open-hearth furnaces, in which all the armor-plate ingots were melted and from which they were cast ready for forging to shape. I worked at these furnaces in every capacity from common laborer to assistant superintendent of the plant. I was never in position to have access to the book costs of this or any other product of the plant. I was, however, in excellent position to realize fully the difficulties involved in the manufacture and the proportionately great amount of labor involved in the preparation of this grade of steel.

I think a few of my estimates may be of interest to you.

I have been much amused—

Very irreverent—

I have been much amused to hear various members of the congressional committee refer to the great difference between the cost per ton of steel rails and armor plates—two products which bear about as much resemblance to each other as a pickaxe to a watch spring.

It is not difficult to calculate roughly that on account of the costly alloys employed, the steel lying melted in the open hearth furnaces represents per ton of finished armor plate, a raw material value of not far from $150. In this connection it must be borne in mind that the Government requires that each finished plate shall represent not over 50 per cent of the weight of the ingot. This means that a minimum of 50 per cent of steel produced by the furnace returns to it as remelted scrap. The alloys in this discarded steel are, to a large extent, wasted, as they are nearly all slagged off during remelting.

Armor-plate ingots are cast in carefully prepared sand molds similar to those used in steel foundaries. At a low estimate based on heaviest and cheapest steel-casting work this molding must add to the cost of the plate per ton $40. This makes armor steel worth $190 per ton before it has gone to the armor-plate department at all.

There are a large number of circumstances affecting the cost of armor steel to which it is very difficult to give a value. These items, if an attempt were made to figure them into the cost of the plate, would probably be thrown out by any congressional committee. They do, however, enter into the cost of the steel and, to my mind, largely affect it.

The entire steel department is organized and scheduled for armor plate. Everything else is provisional and liable at any moment to be sidetracked.

Each furnace requires from 12 to 18 hours to produce a heat of steel. An armor-plate ingot requires two furnaces pouring simultaneously. These must, moreover, be furnaces previously chosen and brought into condition for armor heat by a previous melting of a suitable grade of steel. It is more than probable that when an armor heat is scheduled for any time after the first day or two of the week, the furnaces will have gotten out of step to such an extent that one will have to be held empty for possibly as much as eight or nine hours, waiting for its partner to be ready. The two furnaces full of armor steel must be melted down with the greatest of care so as to bring them both along to final condition uniformly. The period required to complete the heat is variable as much as 50 per cent, and there are a large number of circumstances which can delay one or the other furnace. As the two must be brought along together, every accidental delay is exactly doubled, and armor heats take from 40 to 50 per cent longer to make than other steel on this account alone. There is furthermore a lively possibility that on account of this necessity of holding back first one furnace and then the other the furnace bottom may be eaten through and the whole charge run out into the pit as scrap. I have had this happen time after time. For this reason it is common practice to have still a third heat coming along—its composition being such that at short notice it can be worked over into an armor plate heat to replace a heat spoiled. You can readily understand that if there were no other difficulties than these the scheduling of steel through the furnace department would be quite an intricate job. This is merely the beginning. The same difficulties are duplicated in the casting pit and the condition here is further aggravated by the fact that the armor-plate ingot mold takes up space in front of the furnaces all out of proportion to its tonnage and that furthermore the preparation of a mold ties up this space for about 10 days before pouring, and it is at least 4 days after pouring before the ingot can be moved.

A further item of expense in the making of armor steel is this: Under ordinary circumstances certain impurities can be removed by careful management of the melted steel in the furnace. The proper conditioning of armor steel requires careful manipulation of the furnace, and the two conditions may oppose each other. It is therefore necessary to charge as raw material in the furnace steel scrap and pig iron of a much higher grade than would ordinarily be used and at a considerably higher cost. This is necessary so that during the few hours directly preceding the pouring the melter's energies can be directed solely to the proper conditioning of the steel as armor without reference to conditions required for the elimination of impurities.

On the pouring side of the furnace we find the same sort of a story. The care and attention demanded are everywhere infinitely greater than would be supposed.

The ramming up of the sand mold is a task of such delicacy that the jobs are given only to highly trustworthy and intelligent men. In my time the work was done solely by Americans who naturally drew the wages which trustworthiness and intelligence demand. The ferrostatic pressure on the mold is enormous, and the least deviation from proven practice means an appalling disaster. One of the minor troubles includes the cracking off of facing sand from the inside of the mold, producing sand pockets in the steel. So carefully are these enormous molds built up that sand is not allowed to be shoveled into them; but must be handed down in tin pails, one pail at a time. Each pailful of sand must be carefully tamped in and the pail returned before any more sand is sent down. You will be interested to learn that during the four or five days required in the ramming up of a mold—a job requiring seven or eight men—there is a foreman, whose duty consists principally in keeping a running record of the progress of the mold and the exact portion worked on at every particular moment by every man on the job. The mold is, after completion, marked off with inch marks on the inside, and during the pouring of the ingot this foreman stands over the opening, stop watch in hand, checking off the various sections as the metal rises and noting the behavior of the surface. Any irregular behavior of the mold can be traced back at once to the operator responsible. I recall the breaking out of an armor plate ingot which I myself poured. The accident was fortunately attended by no serious injury to life. The foreman checked back over his records and located the man responsible for the portion of the mold through which the steel broke out. After some time the man confessed his responsibility. He had been out late the night before and was too tired to keep up with the other men on the job. He took advantage of a moment's absence of the foreman and managed to dump in three pailfuls of sand in place of one, with the result that this spot got one-third the tamping that it deserved. The result was an accident that might easily have cost several lives, and actually stood the Steel Co. a loss of $25,000.

This is from a practical man who made armor plate. How idle it is to come in here with these estimates of naval officers who never cast a plate in their lives.

The careful organization of a plant to the degree required by such a product is by no means a simple matter.

I might go on through a number of pages, tracing down one point after another, to show how the making of armor steel in a steel plant interferes with all normal operations and materially increases the cost of every other pound of steel made in the plant. It is impossible to show these items up on a cost sheet.

I have had very little to do with armor steel in the armor-plate department itself—that is, the forging, machining, casehardening, and tempering of the plates. I have, however, seen enough to permit me to understand what elements might enter into the further cost of armor steel.

With a very few exceptions, the powerful and costly equipment required in the further manufacture of armor plates is not adaptable to any other purpose, and during a "small-navy" administration must lie absolutely idle. The labor employed must of necessity be highly intelligent, trustworthy, and carefully trained in this specialty. This large crew of highly specialized, skilled mechanics must at such times be either lost entirely or must be taken care of on unfamiliar jobs at higher wages than their services justify outside their specialty. I have seen the armor-plate department pass through a depression of this sort, and know it to be a terrible drain on the company's resources.

I have been in position to become familiar in a general way with the feeling of the executives regarding the armor-plate business and the general understanding is that while the armor-plate plant running full is a splendid dividend producer, it is, when idle, a terrific drain on the plant, and, all in all, it is extremely doubtful whether as a business proposition the plant would not be better off outside the game altogether.

I do not believe that armor plate can be made under the best of conditions at a lower cost than $350 a ton. I believe that the cost of making armor in a Government plant, even under the peculiar accounting methods which governmental departments permit, would always exceed $600 per ton. The making of armor should involve a considerable amount of costly experimenting. Some of the problems involved are peculiar to armor and others are shared in common with alloy steel in general and with the steel-making industry. For this reason an armor-plate plant is naturally an adjunct of a plant constantly carrying forward the development of alloy steel and steel-making processes. In this respect a Government armor-plate plant would be sadly handicapped, and I firmly believe that the output of such a plant would always be from 5 to 10 years behind the world in all that pertains to the development and perfecting of protective armor.

I am thoroughly in sympathy with the feeling of the armor makers that if the Government enters this field they must leave it. There has never been enough work to keep even two armor plants properly employed.

The proposal advanced by a certain committee member that the Government operate such a plant only eight hours a day would be laughable if the situation were not so serious. It frightens me to realize that affairs connected with the defense of this country are in the hands of Representatives so little conversant with the subject as to propose or entertain such an absurdity. Armor plate can not be picked up and laid down like a piece of embroidery. It must have attention when it is ready for attention and not one hour sooner or later. With the exception of certain machine-shop operations in squaring up the ends and drilling for bolts, armor making is essentially in all of its many branches, a 24-hour job. One operation alone requires no less than 28 days of continuous heat treatment at a high temperature.

I see nothing unusual in the proposal of the armor plants to immediately increase the price of armor for the amortization of their investment. The first armor plant entered the field at the earnest solicitation of our Government. Our Government has on two subsequent occasions encouraged the installation of competing plants beyond the capacity of the country to absorb the product. In my opinion, the armor makers have not had as much as would be considered a fair return on their outlay, and I think they are entirely justified in protecting their stockholders in the manner proposed.

I am rather surprised at finding myself in the position of defending the armor makers. I do not feel that I owe anything in particular to the plant with which I was connected. Furthermore, I have been from time to time more or less in sympathy with agitations similar to this drive against the armor companies, and you can judge fairly well what my normal state of mind is from the fact that I was, during its existence, a member of the Progressive Party. Now, however, the attack has become concentrated on an industry with which I am entirely familiar. When I see the treatment accorded these manufacturers, the small amount of credence given their statements, the attitude of the louder section of the press, and the pitiful ignorance displayed by those of our Representatives who have the matter directly in charge, I begin to wonder how many times I have been deceived along similar lines in matters about which I was not so well informed.

I hope you will find it possible to do something to bring about the defeat of legislation looking forward to the installation of a Government armor factory.

Yours, very truly, KENNETH B. LEWIS.

Mr. Lewis lives now in Worcester, Mass., and is connected with the Morgan Construction Co.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If it will not interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts, I have been very much interested in the comparative statement of the cost of the construction of armor plate in other countries than our own. It would seem from a cursory review of that report that conditions abroad must be much more burdensome to the industry than they are in our own country or that we are getting our armor plate at a very fair price.

I was going to ask the Senator whether in the Japanese figures, which seem to be very large as compared with our own, in view of the fact that Japanese labor is very much cheaper than our own, there would seem to be a very great discrepancy there. Can the Senator say whether or not their inability to obtain the raw material from which armor plate is to be made enters very largely into the question of that excess cost?

Mr. LODGE. I suppose in the case of Japan there may be some addition in the difficulty of getting raw material, but that must be more than made up by the difference in labor cost.

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator will allow me, I will suggest that in my opinion one of the great elements of increased cost in the Japanese factory lies in this, that it is inevitable that it will cost more to make armor in an armor-plate factory which does nothing else than in one which is merely an adjunct of a great steel works with the ability to use all that is included in the manufacture of other branches of steel and which in addition can use up the scrap and refuse and everything else in other departments.

Mr. LODGE. That is absolutely true, and I called attention to the fact that the workmen could be employed all the time at high wages by putting them in other departments, and also to the question of the power. These plants have the power which applies to all the other branches. The Government plant must have power for one department of manufacture alone.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, is it not fair to assume that the Government plant in Japan at the time these figures were given was employed continuously in the work that it has undertaken to do? It is my impression that the work has been very largely utilized by the Japanese Government during the last few years, and if the figures which the Senator from Massachusetts has produced——

Mr. LODGE. These are from the Navy Yearbook.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If those figures show a normal condition of production, then the normal price must be augmented very largely by their inability to get raw material as cheaply as our people can get it.

Mr. LODGE. These Japanese figures are not the figures of this year but of a year ago. They give no information of anything when the prices of steel were not as high as they are now. I simply use the Japanese figures because Japan is the only country that has attempted to have a Government armor plant, and they being new in manufacturing industry may not have the great steel industries which we have and which they have in Europe, which would enable them to turn those industries to the making of plate. It may have been a necessity with them, but it is interesting as showing that the only Government plant of which we know in a land of cheap labor is turning out armor at a much higher cost, $100 more, than the Bethlehem Co. offers to make it for the next five years. If it can get a continuous contract for five years it can make it for $395 a ton.

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator will allow me, in response to the question of the Senator from Michigan, I will state that the Japanese have access to Chinese pig iron produced in the Chinese market at less than half what it can be produced for in this country.

Mr. LODGE. We are told that this plant can be built——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Senator state what authority there is for the giving of those figures in the Japanese estimates?

Mr. LODGE. It comes from the Navy Yearbook.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My information is from the chairman of the Committe on Naval Affairs that it is a mere guess, and, like all other information that comes out from Japan, it is hidden behind an impenetrable curtain.

Mr. LODGE. The Navy Yearbook is prepared by the secretary of the Committee on Naval Affairs and the figures are taken from the reports of the Navy Department.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think if the Senator investigates he will find that it is the merest guess and there is absolutely no warrant for it.

Mr. LODGE. What is the Senator's guess?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My guess is that with the cheap labor in Japan and with the supply of iron from China they are manufacturing their armor plate at far less than that.

Mr. LODGE. That is the Senator's guess?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no doubt they very carefully conceal that fact from the world.

Mr. LODGE. If that is a guess, what shall we say of the guess of men who have never run an armor plant giving us estimates of what it will cost? This information about foreign countries comes direct from those countries through the Navy Department. The Navy Yearbook published by the committee is as authentic as any information we can have. At all events it is more authentic than the individual guess of any Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is possible that I am not in a position to know anything, but the Senator from Massachusetts realizes that it is almost impossible for the officials of the United States to get the slightest bit of information out of Japan concerning even the construction of their naval vessels. American officials and Americans are barred from the navy yards and they are barred from their plants.

Mr. LODGE. I think the information of the Navy Department is better than any of our guesses. At all events it is all we have to go on.

We are told that it will take 18 months to build a plant, or from 18 months to 2 years. Mr. President, we authorized two battleships a year ago. Not one stroke has been done on either of them yet and there will not be before September. In order theoretically to save money, I suppose, they were given by the Secretary to two Government yards, though the ways in those yards were occupied and we shall not get the keels of those ships laid until next September—at the earliest, 18 months.

How long do you think it will be with a Government department operating in that way before they get started on an armor plant? They have to buy the land. The authorities must have it condemned. It may be that they will take into court the whole question of the value of the land. They have to make their plans.

Here, we are building battleships from year to year, yet they can not get the plans ready. What would the delay be with an armor plant?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. On that point, it was testified by the manufacturers that at least double that time would be required to construct a Government plant. Admiral Strauss himself admitted that. It is extremely doubtful whether it can be constructed at all at the present time, on account of the high price of material and the difficulty of getting some material from any place, on account of the war in Europe.

Mr. LODGE. I am much obliged to the Senator. He has anticipated what I was going to say. I am very glad he has done so, for the Senator is more familiar with the subject than I am.

Admiral Strauss made that statement. In fact I think it is generally agreed by everybody who has taken the trouble to look into it that it will be from four to five years before we can get the plans. That is just the beginning. You have to get your organization. You can not walk out into the street and pick up these superintendents and skilled workmen who have been gradually brought together in the private plants. The organization of a great plant is one of the most important things in regard to it. We have therefore a period of, I think, at least five years before we can begin to turn out armor, and we have no provision whatsoever for making armor in that interim.

Now, I want to give an illustration of the Government's attempts at manufacture. The Government tried at one time to make steel castings. Steel castings are the simplest form of steel. The Government thought it could save something by buying pig iron and casting its own steel. I will not go into the details of it, but the facts are of record that the Government steel turned out so badly, was so full of blowholes and cracks, and cost so much to produce that the whole project was abandoned two years ago. And the Government turned back to the commercial market for its rudimentary ingots. They failed completely to make steel castings, which are the very A B C of the armor business. The investment was trifling, of course.

There is this, however, to be said: The Government will have the advantage in the rapidity with which it can turn out plates, because now the armor produced by private manufacturers is subjected to tests and inspections so rigid that a large tonnage is oftentimes rejected. The Government often specifies in the contract a certain number of ballistic tests, and then arbitrarily doubles the tests before acceptance. I have some doubts whether the Government would be quite so severe with itself with an armor plant filled with superintendents and workmen, who are there primarily on the basis of votes and politics.

We have an example of how the Government sometimes acts in that way, as in the case of cartridge cases made at the Washington Navy Yard. When they were furnished by private contractors the specifications required that they should stand a test of five firings; but when the Government undertook the manufacture that requirement was abandoned. The Government is not strict with itself and we run the risk of bad shells which might easily mean defeat instead of victory.

The Government also a little while ago undertook to leave the people who had always been making steel breechblocks in order to try a new company that had underbid. I will not go into that, for it does not bear so directly on this matter; but it is an interesting thing as showing the Government's method of doing business; and I will ask leave to print it with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered in the absence of objection. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

For example, a year and a half ago the Navy Department ordered 48 breechblocks and 48 screw box liners for 14-inch guns of the Pennsylvania Steel Co. This company, it seems, had underbid the regular producers of this line of high-grade steel products, and the Navy Department clutched at the chance to save a few dollars. On these 48 sets of breech mechanism forgings, it was found necessary to take 25 from the contractor and give them to an experienced company in order to get the work out. Twelve sets of the remaining 23 have been delivered to the Government. The success with the remaining 11 is yet to be determined. It should be added that the other parts for the guns had been delivered to the Government by other makers and lay useless waiting for the fulfillment of the cheap order. Such results as these tend to create a serious suspicion as to the quality of the 12 sets which the contractor painfully finished. Let us hope that the final test will not come in the face of an enemy who puts efficiency ahead of dollars.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is demonstrated, I think, beyond question that the quality of steel used in the manufacture of armor is the highest; that our armor manufacturers are constantly at work developing processes and improving armor; that they are furnishing armor to our Government at a lower price than any other Government is receiving it; and that their profits have not averaged much over 4 per cent per annum on the whole investment. They do not regard it as a very valuable adjunct to their business. Now, if they are going to be destroyed, if the Government plant is established, these private manufacturers go out of business.

The manufacturers of armor are not like the makers of powder, the makers of rifles, and the builders of ships. There is only one customer for armor plate. If the Government begins to make its own armor plate, the private manufacturers go out of business, and we are left with nothing but the Government armor plant, which can not be expanded, and which will take a long time to build up and develop. During the five years that will elapse, certainly, before we can begin to make a pound of armor plate, how is the Navy to be supplied? The armor-plate makers say, if they are to be condemned to extinction, that they should expect and should receive for their armor plate a price which would enable them, in part at least, to pay for the investment which they have made. They have been denounced as unpatriotic for making any such suggestion. Well, Mr. President, I know we are very patriotic about the expenditure of money from the Treasury of the United States, but I have not observed either in Members of the other House or in Senators—who are, after all, merely human—any greater desire to sacrifice their own property than exists among other people. When a man is going to have his property wiped out, he will do the best he can to protect himself.

Of course there is a bill here, I am aware, to walk in and confiscate their property. I do not think we have yet quite reached that point of wrong and injustice; but, if we confiscate their property, we should get only crippled plants. The power does not go with the armor plant. All the other departments would be apart from the Government. We should be but little better off even if we entered upon the policy of confiscation. We have either got to pay a much higher price for our armor for five years, or we have got to go without armor, and during that period to paralyze the building operations of the Navy. We can not have dreadnaughts or superdreadnaughts or ships of the first line of battle without armor; and we are entering upon this dangerous business at this perilous time.

I realize—we have seen plenty of it in the last few years—that it is considered in certain quarters little short of a crime to make money in business; and I understand the desire that exists in many minds to punish men who have been successful in business merely on account of their success; but it seems to me that it is less important at this moment to prevent some American business from making a small profit than it is to have our coasts defended. I am much more afraid—not afraid, but I am much more concerned about the injury of a foreign foe than I am about the injury that may be caused by some American company or some American business man making money if they make it in an honest way. I think we can wait a little while before destroying these businesses until at least the peril of the present time has passed. I think we ought not yet to run the risk of arresting the upbuilding of our Navy at such a moment as this.

I ask the Senate to look at other Governments—Governments which are more paternal in their methods than is our own. Look at the prices that Germany and England and France pay for their armor as compared with what we pay for ours. The world admits the efficiency of Germany. She buys all her armor from, I believe, two manufacturers. She does not do that without reason; she does not give those people the opportunity to make money without reason. She thinks that the profit those people make is cheap for the Government in the long run. It is obvious that Germany—and the other countries no doubt do the same—goes below the petty question of whether a manufacturer is making 4 per cent or 7 per cent, and goes down to the root of the matter; and that is in what way the Nation can be surest of a continual supply of the munitions of war and with a power of expansion which will serve her best in time of stress. She finds that the way to secure that is not to dwell within the iron limitations of a Government plant, but to bring in the great influence of selfish human interest, so that it shall be for the interest of private capital to hold their great plants, some years making little returns, some years making fair returns, some years perhaps making no returns at all, but always ready for what the private plant alone can give—quick expansion.

Germany runs her military affairs, runs her army and her navy as economically as does any nation in the world; but she runs them on the principles of true economy. It does not trouble her to have her armor-plant makers making profits, for she thinks that is cheaper in the long run to the German people, and that in that way when the hour of pressure comes she can get what she needs.

We are now proposing to make an initial appropriation of $11,000,000, and before we get through it will be over $20,000,000, and to put it into an armor plant which will not promote the national defense one iota, but which, if anything, will hamper and hold back the development of the Navy at this time of all others, when the lessons of the need of a great Navy ought to be known by every man, and are known, I believe, by the people of this country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If it will not disturb the Senator, I should like to ask him a question. I find in the report made by the chairman of the Naval Committee this language:

> When the special committee, consisting of Senator Tillman, Congressman Padgett, and Admiral Strauss, investigated the whole subject last year, that committee could not obtain any authoritative or reliable information whatever as to the cost of armor.

Then, farther down, there occurs this statement:

> It suffices to say that the committee is of the opinion that the Government has been charged unreasonable prices for its armor plate, and that the only remedy lies in the Government owning and operating a plant, as provided for in Senate bill 1417. Should the Government build it and then lock it up, and it never be used, it would be wise to erect it, as it would serve as a warning to private manufacturers that there is a point beyond which the Government will not be driven and where patience ceases to be a virtue.

It seems to me, if that epitomizes all of the information which the committee has on this subject, it is a most astounding foundation for the expenditure of $11,000,000 to build an armor plant.

Mr. LODGE. That is the whole case. It is not true that the committee could not get the costs; they have been invited to examine the books, but the companies have refused to exhibit their secret processes for the benefit of the world.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question in my mind is not whether the committee were able to obtain the figures showing the cost. This report confesses that they have not done so and that they have absolutely no information whatever upon the question of what it costs to manufacture armor, and consequently the committee which reported this bill must admit that they have no notion whatever as to what it is going to cost the Government to manufacture armor. The question I want to ask the Senator is whether or not it is true that neither the committee nor anybody else who is pressing this kind of legislation knows anything whatever upon the subject as to what it is going to cost the Government to manufacture armor plate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the costs were thoroughly explained. I tried to follow them from the beginning. Taking the Government estimate as a basis, and adding 10 per cent, which is very conservative, for the difference between the time when the Government estimate was made and the present time, the result is, as I have said, the pure factory cost of $289.07, not taking the Government's estimate as to other charges, which are mere estimates, mere guesswork.

Mr. SUTHERLAND and Mr. PITTMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah and the Senator from Nevada have addressed the Chair. To whom does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will ask the Senator whether he agrees that it is not possible for the Government of the United States, with its wasteful methods of doing business, its inability to procure the best talent and experts to look after industries like this, to manufacture armor plate anything like as cheaply as it can be manufactured by private producers?

Mr. LODGE. My own belief is that it will cost the Government at least $600 a ton after they get it all going and their organization made up.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator's remarks to go unquestioned, because the Senator from Massachusetts knows that the committee of which the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. TILLMAN) is chairman did make an estimate as to the manufacturing costs.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I have so stated over and over again.

Mr. PITTMAN. And that estimate as to costs was practically agreed to also by the private manufacturers?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. The only real difference of opinion was as to the general expenses, overhead charges, for which we would not get an estimate from the private manufacturers.

Mr. LODGE. It was agreed that the factory cost, allowing for the difference between the time when the Government estimate was made and the present time, would be $289. That cuts out, as I have said, all of the other overhead charges, insurance, repairs, depreciation, interest, and so forth. Those charges will be taken out of the pockets of the people.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the thought advanced by the Senator from Massachusetts, referring to the Krupps as utterly a private institution, it seems to me is not entirely true. I have here an article on the subject of Government ownership generally——

Mr. LODGE. Let the Senator put that in later; I do not care to have an article read now.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no desire——

Mr. LODGE. I know about the organization of the Krupps. It is a private concern; but the Government owns, I believe, an interest in it. I never said it was "utterly private."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I only want to state the fact that the authority which I have declares that the Krupps are not a private institution——

Mr. LODGE. The Senator can insert that later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. LODGE. I do not care to have a newspaper article published in the midst of my remarks.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If the Senator does not want to hear it, very well. I merely wanted to state the facts.

Mr. LODGE. I decline to yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield further.

Mr. LODGE. The organization of the Krupps is perfectly well known to the world. The Senator can put the article in the RECORD in his own time.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Very well, I can stand it if the Senator can.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly familiar with the organization of the Krupps. As I have said it is a private concern with a Government interest in it and no doubt a measure of Government control. But it is not a Government plant. It is run as a business enterprise.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator from Nevada (Mr. PITTMAN) has just stated that in the report which has been made by the so-called Tillman committee it is shown that it was impossible to get an estimate of the overhead charges from the representatives of the armor-plate manufacturers.

Mr. PITTMAN. If I said "estimate" I made a mistake. I meant to say it was impossible to get the facts upon which to determine the correctness of their estimate.

Mr. LIPPITT. I wish to say, Mr. President, that those gentlemen testified under oath as to what those facts were, and shortly I shall take an opportunity to present them to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, what the Senator from Rhode Island says is true; those gentlemen testified under oath as to their overhead charges, which brought the price up to the figures which I gave in the beginning, and which I think were $387 a ton total cost. The only difference of opinion was that the committee, every member of which was totally ignorant of the process of the manufacture and knew nothing whatever about it, did not agree with the armor-plate manufacturers.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, and I am trying not to.

Mr. LODGE. I see the Senator is trying not to, but I am very glad to have him do so.

Mr. PITTMAN. The statement of the Senator from Rhode Island forces me to speak to interrupt the Senator, although I do not want to ask him any further questions. I think the Senator will find—and a little later on I intend to call the Senator's attention to it—that he is mistaken in saying that the armor-plate manufacturers testified under oath to the facts substantiating their estimates. They divided the cost of overhead charges arbitrarily, according to their best judgment, as they said, between their armor plant and their general steel plant. That is what I am getting at. We had, however, no facts.

Mr. LODGE. I believe they testified honestly; I do not believe they are a set of robbers or liars or anything of the kind. I think they are just as honest men as are those who sit in the Senate, and I do not believe they have testified wrongly, nor do I believe that because a man is successful in business he is therefore a criminal, a liar, and a perjurer.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have not charged that.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Before the Senator from Pennsylvania proceeds, if he will allow me, I merely want to say that I do not think the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts were entirely fair under the discussion I was making. I do not believe that anything I said would cast any reflection upon the honesty of any of the witnesses; at least, I had no such intention.

Mr. LODGE. No, I do not think the Senator had.

Mr. PITTMAN. They did not testify to the facts upon which we could draw our conclusions as to the overhead charges.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. There has been so much misapprehension upon this particular point that I will venture to interject a remark.

The Senate committee knows, as the Tillman committee has declared and its has continually reiterated, that these companies refused to give their cost figures. That is only true on the surface. These figures are in many cases compiled by licensed accountants—not by the officials of the company, as I understand, in all cases—and they have been at all times ready to submit to any kind of an examination the Government wanted, by any accountant they might send there, or by any member of the Naval Committee, or any other Member of this body; but they have said that they will require that this information shall be preserved confidential, just as the returns of the corporation tax and the income tax are preserved or supposed to be preserved in the strictest confidence and it is a penal offense to disclose them, under a wise governmental policy, so they have demanded that this information shall be kept confidential with the Naval Committee or with the Secretary of the Navy, in order that it may not be disclosed to any possible competitors here or abroad.

I can not imagine how any man conversant with affairs of business can offer any objection to that proposition. In the case of one particular battleship—I think it was the Pennsylvania—they had an accountant's figures before the Naval Committee and offered to have them examined, and offered to submit them to the Secretary of the Navy with any further corroboration that he might require, to show the actual cost and the very small percentage of profit, much less than that in the commercial phases of the iron and steel business, for the information of the naval authorities and the committee.

There is no unwillingness to disclose these facts. There is an unwillingness to disclose them for general public information, just as no corporation would be willing to have the Commissioner of Internal Revenue publish to the world its returns.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. PITTMAN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact, however, that at the time that offer was made a number of the members of the committee suggested that they would have no right to receive any private information that they could not give to the Senate; that the information would be valueless, unless it could be given to the Senate for its determination upon the facts submitted. They would not allow us to report those facts to this body, when, as a matter of fact, we were simply collecting facts on behalf of this body.

Mr. TILLMAN. And under instructions of this body.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Naval Committee or any members of it are so sensitive on that point there certainly could have been no objection to the Secretary of the Navy, who is the executive head, to barter and trade and negotiate these contracts, receiving that information, any more than there is any objection to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue receiving confidential information.

Mr. PITTMAN. They placed the same restrictions upon the Secretary of the Navy. They would not allow him to transmit those facts to this body.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have tried to show that in my opinion this is going to involve a great waste of the Government money. I think we shall probably get very inferior armor at very much higher prices; that we shall create a situation for the next five years in which we shall either have to pay an enormously increased price for armor or else allow our ships to stand still and have nothing done on the building program. I think this upbuilding of the Navy is so far superior in importance to preventing somebody from making money that the latter noble purpose ought not to be considered for a moment.

Here we have been devoting our time in the Naval Committee to this armor plant when we ought to have been devoting it to the Navy of the United States. The armor plant, even taking it at the terms of its supporters, will not be of the slightest benefit in the direction of national defense, and what we should think of first is the defense of the country. That is what the American people desire. They are not interested in armor plants. They want ships. They want a fleet that can defend us on both the Atlantic and the Pacific. They do not want anything done that may arrest the building of a fleet.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate, in closing, to our present condition in a general way, and show where we need to spend our money now, and spend it quickly, and get the work done as rapidly as possible.

Rear Admiral Fletcher, before the House Committee on Military Affairs, on December 9, 1914, stated:

> We have not been able to get 16 ships together since we first sent ships to Mexico, but previous to that we always maneuvered with 16 or 17 ships in fleet exercises.

The Secretary of the Navy writes:

> The following dreadnaughts, predreadnaughts, destroyers and submarines are at present in Southern waters under the command of Admiral Fletcher:
> Dreadnaughts and predreadnaughts: Wyoming, Arkansas, Delaware, New York, Texas, Florida, Kansas, Michigan, South Carolina, Utah, Virginia, Nebraska, New Jersey, Rhode Island, and Louisiana—
> Fifteen.
> It is expected that the Oklahoma, Nevada, and Pennsylvania will be added to the fleet some time in May.

He also gives the destroyers and submarines, which amount to nothing, and says there are no air craft.

Now, I take those statements of what the fleet is. We hear that we have 41 battleships. That is the statement that is put out to the country—that we have 41 battleships, dreadnaughts and predreadnaughts and superdreadnaughts, built or building, or authorized. Those that are building or authorized are simply ships on paper. What we want to know, what it is important for us to know, is the strength of our actual fighting fleet which can defend the coasts of the United States if war should come upon us. Let me analyze those 41 ships.

Nine of them are building, or authorized. That leaves 32.

Three are recorded in the directory of February 1, 1916, as out of commission—the Indiana, Iowa, and Massachusetts. The Iowa was authorized in 1892, and the Indiana and Massachusetts in 1890. I think they were commissioned in 1894. They are more than 20 years old now. They are out of commission. That leaves 29.

The Oregon, which is in full commission, is more than 20 years old. She was built at the same time as the Indiana and Massachusetts, and, although now on special service, is superannuated for the battle line. That leaves 28.

In commission, but in reserve, are the North Dakota and the Georgia, which are also under repair, and the Alabama, Illinois, Maine, Missouri, Ohio, and Wisconsin—a total of 8. That leaves 20. Those are vessels in commission but in reserve, and we are told that this is done in other countries; but it is done with this important difference: The ships in reserve in other countries have their full complement of men. Our ships in reserve have not half their complements of men. They are stripped of their men in order to supply the fleet, because we have a shortage of seamen due to the failure of Congress to appropriate, and the result is that these ships are, for the time being, really out of commission.

That leaves 20. There are also under repair the New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, and Kearsarge. Those four ships have some structural defect, so that if they are pushed to a speed of over 12 knots they have a torsional vibration at the stern which it is feared will crack the shafts. There is some structural defect in them, I am sorry to say, and they will have to be largely rebuilt. That leaves 16.

The Kentucky is stationed at Vera Cruz. Therefore we are able to mobilize 15 ships of the first fighting line, with three submarines, no air craft, and no battle cruisers.

Why, in 1907, with a total of 23 ships, we were able to mobilize 16, which left Hampton Roads and went around the world. And now the country is treated to the statement that we have 41 ships, and yet we can mobilize but 15 ships, or, including the Kentucky, 16; and if we can add the Oklahoma, Nevada, and Pennsylvania in the course of the next few months—as I hope we shall—we shall have 18.

The President of the United States has stated in his speeches that we have sunk from the second place, which we occupied some years ago, to the fourth place. He has better information than I have, and I suppose he is correct in saying that we have sunk to the fourth place. This would be due to the increase of building in France. But there is not any question that we have sunk to the third place. The only complete figures, of course, are those of July 1, 1914. We have no thoroughly accurate figures about the building during the war. At that time, however, Great Britain had, of dreadnaughts and superdreadnaughts, 20 built, 16 building, a total of 36. Germany had 13 built, 7 building, a total of 20. We had 8 built, 7 building, a total of 15. France had 3 built and 9 building, a total of 12. Japan had 2 built and 4 building, a total of 6.

Mr. President, when we can mobilize at this moment only 15 ships; when we have not a single battle cruiser even authorized by Congress; when we reflect that the Bluecher, which was destroyed in the North Sea, was caught and destroyed because she was the slowest ship in the German squadron, and yet she is faster than any ship in the United States Navy; when we consider that here, on the statement of the Secretary himself, there are no aeroplanes with the fleet, three or four practically valueless submarines—in the presence of a condition like that, and in view of the present state of the world, to turn from building up the American Navy to wasting money on the doubtful experiment of armor plants in order that somebody shall be prevented from making money, in order to break down an industry and force people out of an industry which is giving us armor cheaper than any other nation in the world is getting it—in the presence of that condition of the United States, to turn from the building of battle cruisers and dreadnaughts, from the defense of the coasts which the people of the United States demand, and give our time to this foolish scheme of an armor plant, simply because somebody does not like the makers of armor, seems to me little short of criminal.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island permit me to interrogate the Senator from Massachusetts for a moment?

Mr. LIPPITT. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator made a statement which rather startled me with reference to the speed of the ships which we now have in commission. Is there any hope that their speed will be materially increased in the future, or are we to go on building ships that are slower than those built abroad?

Mr. LODGE. I hope we shall increase the speed of our ships in the future. In the case of the two last English ships of which I have any information—I am not speaking now of battle cruisers, but of superdreadnaughts, heavily armored ships—their speed test was 25 knots. In the case of our ship just out, the Pennsylvania, I think her speed test was between 21 and 22 knots. We have got to bring up our speeds. That is the weakest point, and we have not a single battle cruiser or a fast ship.

Mr. HUGHES. This condition, evidently, if it affects all these ships to which the Senator refers, has existed now for a long time.

Mr. LODGE. Ah, but other nations have been increasing the speed of their ships, and we have not. We have declined to build fast ships. Congress has not appropriated for them.

Mr. HUGHES. Does the Senator mean that it is the fault of Congress—that Congress limits the speed?

Mr. LODGE. Why, of course it does. Speed costs money. It is the most expensive thing about a ship. Every knot you add costs a million or so additional.

Mr. HUGHES. Everybody understands that.

Mr. LODGE. That, of course, the Senator knows. Very well. We have not authorized the fast type of battle cruisers. Japan has four of those ships to-day afloat. In July, 1914, Great Britain had 10 battle cruisers, Germany had 8, Japan had 4, Russia had 4, and we had none.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator who he thinks is responsible for this failure to have fast battleships?

Mr. LODGE. Congress.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Which Congress? Not this Congress.

Mr. LODGE. Well, the last Congress. What difference does it make? I am ready to spread the blame. I am not making a partisan speech.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is a very influential member of the Republican side. He has been in the Senate for a great many years.

Mr. LODGE. I have.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is the Senator condemning the Republican Congress and the Republican administration?

Mr. LODGE. No; I merely said that in 1907 we could mobilize a fleet of 16 ships out of 23 and send them around the world, while to-day, out of a nominal strength of 38, you can only mobilize 16. You have not advanced a particle.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am asking the Senator who is to blame for it?

Mr. LODGE. I will tell the Senator. I do not want to bring party matters into this discussion. The Congress that cut down the battleships, that cut us down from two a year to one a year, was the Democratic Congress that came in before Mr. Taft went out.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am asking the Senator about the speed of battleships. That, he says, is the great defect of our Navy to-day.

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has enlarged upon it.

Mr. LODGE. I have.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The battleships that are now in commission were largely the product of Republican Congresses and administrations; were they not?

Mr. LODGE. They were, and they were the best of their time. The battle cruiser is a more modern ship.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Why is the Senator scolding the Democratic administration and the Democratic Congress, then?

Mr. LODGE. I am not scolding the Democratic administration.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest that the Senator should go further back.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has taken a cap and fitted it on his own head. I said nothing about the Democratic administration until he began to carry it back by asking as to what party was to blame. I think both parties have been to blame. I think Congress has been to blame. It is to blame to-day. It is to blame at this moment for spending its time on this wretched bill for an armor plant, when we need ships to fight the battles of the country. You are spending more money to build an armor plant—it will cost $20,000,000—than you can build a battle cruiser for, and the battle cruiser will defend your country, but the armor plant is of no use.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator is hardly fair in attempting to bring in another issue here when it is proposed to add to the defenses of the country by the construction of an armor plant. The fact that the great Government of the United States enters upon the construction of an armor plant is no reason why it should diminish its energies in other directions; and I am at a loss to understand why the Senator criticizes this Congress and this administration.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has not done me the honor to listen to me, and I do not think it would have had any effect if he had, but I tried to explain it by saying that I thought this whole business was likely to arrest the building of ships.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator explain why?

Mr. LODGE. Why, Mr. President, no. I have explained it three or four times, and it is not my fault if the Senator did not hear it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I had the pleasure of listening to most of what the Senator said, but I have been unable to connect the two matters.

Mr. LODGE. Why, Mr. President, it is perfectly plain. You can not get a Government armor plant going, you can not get it up and ready—I will say nothing of the organization—under five years. I am ashamed to keep repeating this statement so often. What are you going to do in the five years?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Meanwhile, we will be purchasing armor.

Mr. LODGE. Yes, exactly; and you will be purchasing it from them at $600 a ton.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why?

Mr. LODGE. Why, because they have a right, if you are going to ruin their property, to try to cover their losses.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the Senator really is here in the attitude of threatening the Government of the United States——

Mr. LODGE. I am not threatening it at all. I am merely telling the Senator the facts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. By saying that in the construction of armor-plate factories the present factories will proceed to plunder the United States by charging two prices for the armor.

Mr. LODGE. They will not plunder the United States. The United States is plundering them. That is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that there is a law on the statute books now which prohibits the United States from purchasing armor abroad, and it would be very easy for Congress to repeal that law if the armor plant undertook to hold up the Government.

Mr. LODGE. You can buy armor plate in England at $500 a ton; you can buy armor plate in Germany at over $500 a ton; you can go to Japan and probably buy it at $490 a ton if those countries are so unpatriotic as to sell it when they are at war.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It would be just as easy for the United States to buy armor in one of those foreign countries at $368 a ton as it was for Russia to buy armor of the United States at that price.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. That matter of Russia buying armor at a couple of hundred dollars less was nothing but as a sample, away below cost, in the hope of getting business. The amount sold abroad is perfectly negligible. The whole amount is less than 3,000 tons. The other countries encourage manufacturers to make armor plate. They do not try to ruin them. They are trying to build them up, and they buy their own armor at home.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course the same threat was made against the United States when the United States went into the manufacture of powder, but the fact was that when the United States went into the manufacture of powder it paid extortionate prices, and since that time the price of powder has come down from 80 cents to 70 cents and from 70 cents to 60 cents, and from 60 cents the price is about 53 cents.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator allow me just at that point? The Senator, I am sure, does not mean to say what is not the fact.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Probably it is not.

Mr. LIPPITT. The fact is that the United States was paying 53 cents for powder when the Government went into it and not 80 cents. Prior to that date there had been a continuous decline in the price of powder from 80 cents to 53. Now, the Government of the United States is trying to make a case for itself by assuming that the price of powder would never have been lower than 53 cents, although the price had been continually falling up to that time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator is mistaken in his statement. I was a Member of the House of Representatives at the time that the powder plant down here at Indianhead was doubled, and at that time the price was 53 cents. I do not recall it, but prior to that time it had been very much higher. My recollection is that it was as high as 80 cents a pound for smokeless powder.

Mr. LIPPITT. If I am mistaken, then the Secretary of the Navy is mistaken, because I am quoting the figures which he gives at page 58 of his report.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For what year is that?

Mr. LIPPITT. Nineteen hundred and fifteen.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I mean, what year was the powder purchased at that price?

Mr. LIPPITT. According to his report, the price of powder by private manufacturers has varied as follows:

In 1897, $1 per pound; in 1898, 85 cents per pound; in 1899–1900, 80 cents; 1901, 75 cents; 1902–1906, 70 cents; 1907–8, 69 cents; 1908, 63 cents; 1910–1913, 60 cents; 1914–15, 53 cents.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That verifies what I say.

Mr. LIPPITT. In 1900 it was 80 cents a pound, but when the United States started manufacturing the price was 53 cents.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That verifies exactly what I say. The price of powder came down, and its reduction was accelerated when the United States began the manufacture of powder, and it has been forced down because the United States in its powder plant has demonstrated that the cost of powder was very much below what the Government was paying under contract.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I do not want to discuss the powder question, but I shall take the floor on another subject.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, after the very exhaustive address which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has just delivered upon the question of a plant for manufacturing armor it would seem almost unnecessary for me to consider the same subject. I feel I shall have to deal with the same facts, and the conclusions at which we shall arrive are not different. But different minds assemble and interpret these facts in a little different way, and therefore I am going to take the liberty of consuming some short time of the Senate in showing my method of arriving at what I believe is the real situation in regard to the manufacture of armor plate in the United States.

The present situation of that industry is this: There are three plants capable of manufacturing armor for our naval vessels—one of them the Bethlehem Co., one the Carnegie Co., and the third the Midvale Co. The three combined are capable of manufacturing about 30,000 tons of armor per annum. Our annual consumption for the last 10 years has averaged about 13,000 tons. So the capacity of the country for manufacturing armor is a little over 50 per cent greater than the annual demand.

It is a very fortunate thing for us at this time that that is the case, because events in the last year have demonstrated to the satisfaction of most of the people of this country that wisdom requires us to increase the tools we have for defending ourselves against foreign attack, and of the two methods that can be used for that purpose, the Army and the Navy, I in conjunction with a great many other people of the United States believe that the Navy is far the most important. The Navy is our first line of defense. So long as that is unbroken the United States is secure against foreign aggression.

I feel very much as Capt. Sims expressed himself before the Naval Committee of the House the other day, when he said that the place to defend the United States is 1,000 miles at sea. If that is a proper statement of the case, then the first and most important duty we have at the present time is the development of a proper naval force to take care of that defense, and it is a very fortunate matter that the policy which has been established in this country in regard to naval armor for more than a third of a century has resulted in the construction here of plants that are capable of meeting the great demand for armor that any adequate naval expansion will call for.

Without those plants in existence as they are it would be utterly impossible for us to consider for a moment the expansion of our Navy. This policy that has been undeviated from since iron and steel vessels came into existence has resulted in putting us in a position to-day where our constructive forces are adequate to deal with the situation.

That being so, Mr. President, I agree fully with what the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has said in regard to the effect of this bill upon our naval program. I believe further that this bill is a menace to the adequate and rapid construction of a navy, more so to the adequacy than to the rapidity. I think so for these reasons: The great question connected with this armor matter is not the question of cost. It is not a matter of high moment to this country whether the armor that is to go on its ships is to cost a few cents more or less per ton.

The important and vital, and very vital, question that is involved in this discussion is the quality of the armor that shall go there. We never know the value of armor, and never will know its value, on a battleship until it comes to the supreme test of battle. If we are going now to build up a Navy, we want to know that the manufacturers who are to furnish the material upon which in the last analysis the protection of this country will depend are under every possible stimulus and encouragement to give to this country not merely the kind of armor that is called for by specifications, not merely the armor that will meet some requirements of the Navy, but the best armor that they know how to make; and in order to get that with certainty those men must feel that they have behind them in their efforts to turn out their products the sympathy and the encouragement of the Government of the United States, with whom they deal.

Mr. President, the particular question that we have under discussion is whether we shall abandon the traditional policy of the United States in regard to its supply of naval armament and substitute for the private factories upon which it has heretofore depended a Government-owned and a Government-managed plant for the purpose of making that armor. It is manifest and needs no elucidation, I think, that if such a plant is built the private plants will go out of existence. Even under the conditions which have prevailed in the recent past those plants have only been able to run a trifle over one-third of the year.

It is certain that with a Government plant capable of producing 40 per cent more than the average annual requirement of the United States there will be no market for the product of these private concerns, that they will have to be dismantled, and such salvage as can be obtained from them will be turned over to the commercial lines of iron and steel manufacture.

In order that we may understand exactly the question that is under discussion I wish to read the bill that has been offered and which is to be voted upon to-morrow at 4 o'clock. In doing so I may say that I am very sorry that on a question which I think is of very vital importance to a very important part of the plans for American security a unanimous-consent agreement should have been entered into to vote upon this bill before any discussion upon it had started. As I have talked with Members of this body I feel convinced that there is a very great lack of information upon this subject among them, more so than has often happened upon a bill of its importance, and I wish that the time was long enough to give an ample and thorough discussion of what is involved in this measure.

Mr. President, the bill which we have under discussion in its amended form as reported by the Senate committee entitled "A bill to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor plate" is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to provide, either by the erection of a factory or by the purchase of a factory, or both, for the manufacture of armor for the vessels of the Navy, said factory or factories to have an annual capacity of not less than 20,000 tons of armor; and the sum of $11,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, for the purposes of this act.

That bill, Mr. President, is a charmingly broad and simple proposition. It directs the Secretary of the Navy to erect an armor factory that shall have a capacity of not less than 20,000 tons. The only limitation there is in regard to this project is that the size of the factory shall be not less than 20,000 tons. How large it shall be is not specified. As to where it shall be erected, of what character it shall be, how long it will take to construct it, no detail is considered and no limitation of cost is provided.

With a bill of this character presented to the Senate which in itself conveys no information as regards the details that are involved in it, it seems to me there should be presented a report which is full and complete in the information it gives to the Senate and to the country as regards the project with which it deals.

The purpose that this bill proposes to carry out is a business matter. It is purely a business undertaking. The promoters of it appear before the country and ask them to contribute an unknown sum of money but which shall not be less than $11,000,000 for a certain purpose.

Mr. President, the prospectus of a proposed business operation has certain requirements to which it must conform if it is going to be at all complete or adequate to the purpose for which it is issued. There is no mystery about what the promoters should say in such a prospectus. There are hundreds of them issued in the United States every year, and where they are issued by efficient people, whose motives are beyond question, they give such information that nobody can be in doubt as to what is proposed.

A prospectus, if I may call it so, has been issued in connection with this matter. It is entitled "A report to accompany Senate bill 1417," and is presented "by Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs," for the information of the Senate.

Mr. President, this report is so extraordinary, not only for the matter which it contains but for the information which it fails to give, that I feel at liberty to call it to the attention of the Senate, that it may fully understand the character of information with which this bill is presented to this body for its consideration.

In this report there is not a word of information about what would be the cost of this plant, about how long it will take to build it, about where it is proposed to build it, about what will be the cost of producing armor in it. On the contrary, it is a report which I think I am justified in saying is both partisan and abusive. It brings in question the protective system, apparently implying that the gentlemen, or some of them, in favor of this scheme of a Government-owned plant are in favor of it because under a protective tariff they are not able to buy armor abroad.

It is abusive in the language which it employs in regard to the people who are engaged in this industry. It declares that in this industry a condition has existed which is "little short of scandalous." It says that the manufacturers who are engaged in it have established "a monopoly and combine of the worst type." It says that they are "essentially greedy and hoggish"; that they have "more power than is compatible with the public good"; that in the hearings which were held on this subject the committee could not obtain from them "any authoritative or reliable information whatever as to the cost of armor"; and that they exhibited "the same capacity for talking without saying anything as that exhibited so artistically by their brethren of earlier years."

Mr. President, this report criticizes the manufacturers of armor plate because it says they have not given any reliable information whatever. A report whose proper purpose it is to give reliable information and which spends a considerable portion of its space in criticizing others for not giving information should at least set them an example which they could follow on other occasions. I find no such example set in this report.

I will ask that this report be printed at the end of my remarks so that anyone who chooses to read it can see exactly what is the character of information which has been given to the Senate upon this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). There being no objection, it is so ordered.

[See appendix.]

Mr. LIPPITT. This report referring to the information that has been given by the witnesses at the hearings uses the following language:

> The same talk of the "value of trade secrets"; the same reluctance to talk cost of production; the same plea of having been encouraged by the Government to go into the business and the consequent unfairness of Government competition; the same inability to recognize that if such a quasi partnership as they claim exists between them and the Government they should, in all fairness, shoulder its liabilities as well as insist on its benefits; indeed, about the only material difference between the hearings of 1916 and those other numerous ones that have followed each other so regularly and so fruitlessly since 1895 is that of dates. To go into these reports would be a waste of time. They are published in pamphlet form and can be easily obtained by interested parties from the document room. The hearings before the Senate committee on this subject are also obtainable, as they have been printed.

Then the report concludes by saying:

> It suffices to say that the committee is of the opinion that the Government has been charged unreasonable prices for its armor plate, and that the only remedy lies in the Government operating a plant, as provided for in Senate bill 1417.

In effect this report declares that all the information that has been obtained at the hearings both at the present time and in the past—and they have been voluminous—is worthless.

Mr. President, if those hearings are worthless, they are the only source of information, so far as I know, which the members of that committee have upon this subject. If those reports and hearings and documents are not such as will give information to the Members of the Senate outside of the committee in case they are read, then I do not know where the members of that committee derive any information that would justify them in reporting any measure at all. Nevertheless, having first declared that their source of information is imperfect and worthless, the committee says "it suffices to say that the committee is of the opinion."

Mr. President, it does not suffice me, and it will not suffice the people whom I represent. I come from a manufacturing State. The people there are accustomed to weighing and measuring manufacturing projects. They know the information upon which they should be built. They know the kind of report that ought to be made. I do not know what may be the case with other Senators in this body, but I do know, sir, that I could not go back to my constituency in Rhode Island and say to them that I voted for a bill of this kind because the committee which reported it declared that they have no valuable or reliable information at all, but nevertheless asked me to believe that their verdict was sufficient. Inasmuch as that committee, through its distinguished chairman, who has said in these hearings that he knows more about the manufacture of armor plate than anybody else in the Senate, has said that it suffices to say that a certain majority of this committee were in favor of this project, and as they have in this way challenged the credibility of their verdict, I think it is not out of the way or improper for me to consider the qualifications of those gentlemen.

The bill was reported to the Senate by a vote of 9 out of a total committee membership of 17—a majority of 1. The distinguished chairman of that committee, by the Congressional Directory, I find is a farmer; of the other eight who voted for this Government manufacturing project, seven are lawyers, and one is a successful business man from California, who has recently come to the Senate. In that whole list of Senators, whose judgment the chairman of the committee says I should accept without any proof, there is not one man who has ever been engaged in the iron industry; there is not one man who is a manufacturer, or who is accustomed to dealing with manufacturing problems. I think, therefore, that I am justified in asking for some additional information before I make up my mind how I shall deal with this subject.

And, sir, in spite of the statement of this report, that information is not lacking. The report declares that investigations and reports have followed each other fruitlessly. Sir, although I was told it was worthless to do so, I have taken the time and the trouble to look back through those reports to see what they did contain. They cover a period of more than 20 years. They bear all the evidence of having been carefully prepared by able and educated men, and of having been derived from ample sources of information. All of those reports have considered the question which we are considering to-day. They were undertaken for the purpose of deciding and informing the Congress whether or not it would be useful and valuable for the United States to erect an armor plant.

The first of those reports was in 1896, when Mr. Herbert was the Secretary of the Navy. Congress made him responsible for deciding whether or not an armor plant should be built. He says in his message of December 31, 1896, transmitting this to Congress, that he gave the subject the most anxious and serious consideration. As a result of that consideration he says:

> At the last session of Congress I gave, in response to an inquiry from the Committee on Naval Affairs of the United States Senate, the opinion that the Government ought to buy its armor rather than manufacture it. The reasons set forth in that communication are still believed to be sound.

The next investigation of this subject was made in 1900, when Admiral O'Neil presented a very exhaustive report upon it. On page 6 of the testimony given on February 16, 1900, he says:

> I do not think it is expedient for the Government to undertake the manufacture of armor, for several reasons, which I will state.

That is followed by three pages stating the reasons that Admiral O'Neil thought justified these conclusions.

The next investigation was the so-called Niles report, to which frequent reference has been made in the recent hearings, and which was undertaken in 1906. In December Charles J. Bonaparte, who was then the Secretary of the Navy, asked Congress that they give the department, as a protection in dealing with the armor-plate manufacturers, the privilege of erecting an armor plant if the Secretary thought it was necessary. Congress did give him that privilege; and, with the power in his hands to do otherwise, he became satisfied that it was not wise for such a plant to be erected.

That, sir, is the history of the consideration of this subject in the past. The reports that were made upon these occasions were very ample; they contain a very large amount of information in regard to costs and conditions of the business at that time; and the conclusion which all these gentlemen arrived at was that it was not in the interest of the public; it was not in the interest of the United States to change the manufacture of armor plate from private factories to a Government-owned establishment.

Mr. President, that being the history of this subject, I now want to consider for a few moments the question which in this discussion has been made prominent, and that is the cost of manufacturing armor at the present time and the return that has accrued to the manufacturers who are engaged in it. The attempt has been made to show that there is no information available on this subject; that it is impossible to arrive at what the cost of armor is from the testimony in the hearings. Well, Mr. President, I have been accustomed for a great many years to studying reports of this kind, and I can only say for myself that I have had no difficulty in arriving at what to me is a satisfactory statement of those conditions. Unless somebody is disposed or willing to take his stand on the ground that the testimony given in these hearings is false, then I think we must come to the conclusion that all the information fairly necessary to ascertain what it costs to make armor is revealed there.

In the hearings, on pages 7 and 8, in the testimony of Mr. Grace, who represented the Bethlehem Co., there are given four tables, marked as Exhibits "A," "B," "C," and "D." Exhibit C gives the cost of producing armor plate under various conditions. That table is based on the so-called Tillman report, which was the result of an investigation of the present cost of making armor, undertaken recently, and reported to the Senate on February 26, 1915.

The report was made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], as chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, by L. P. PADGETT, as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, and by Joseph Strauss, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance. That report states the cost of producing armor under the most favorable conditions of a plant, running full time, to be $262.79 per ton.

Mr. President, that cost was arrived at in conjunction with the people who are running these plants, and largely as the result of information that was given by them. The committee had at their command the reports and experience of Government inspectors, who were stationed at these plants, with full privilege of inspecting the operations and the product while armor was being manufactured. The representative of the Bethlehem Manufacturing Co., who prepared and presented these tables and put them in evidence, under oath says that this $262.79 fairly represents the cost of making armor under the conditions stated. Mr. Dinkey, the representative of the Midvale people, later on, when testifying upon the subject of cost, made the same assertion. They both agreed with and indorsed the conclusions which were arrived at by the committee of which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] was the chairman, and they accept, under oath, $262.79 as being a fair basis cost for armor under the conditions.

Mr. President, they then go back to the Niles report, to which I have already referred, of 10 years ago, which is also a very carefully prepared report, and, taking as a basis the figures which he has used, show the increase there would be in the cost for a plant running two-thirds full and for a plant running one-third full. They then add to these costs the overhead and administrative costs, which were not taken into consideration by the TILLMAN investigation, and give as a result the total cost of manufacturing armor plate in a factory running full, one running at two-thirds capacity, and one running at one-third capacity. The costs so presented of a plant running at two-thirds capacity amount to $367.82.

On page 43 Mr. Grace testifies in regard to the conditions under which the Bethlehem plant would work if the present hypothetical naval program which is under consideration by Congress should be adopted—or, rather, which I wish were under consideration by Congress, for it has not yet been reported to the Senate or to the House. It is proposed, according to that program, to build ships which will require about 113,000 tons of armor plate in five years. With the additional wastage, the total manufactured product probably would be about 120,000 tons, which would be at the rate of some 24,000 tons per annum. The present capacity of the factories is something over 30,000 tons. Assuming that, under the conditions under which they would then run, the cost would be $367 a ton, we then want to know what would be a fair price for the Government to pay for armor plate.

The price at which the Government has been buying armor is $425 a ton. That is the price which has been paid under conditions which compelled the factories to run at about one-third time. I myself do not think that these concerns have been able to make much profit under those conditions, but it is manifest that they can afford to make armor plate cheaper if they have a larger product on which to run their works. Therefore, toward the end of the hearings, Mr. Grace wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, which is on page 170 of the hearings, in which he offered to reduce the price of armor from $425 a ton to $395 a ton, provided the contemplated naval program were carried out, so as to enable him to run his factory at two-thirds capacity.

We therefore have, as the testimony of Mr. Grace, a cost price for armor under these circumstances of $367 a ton. We have a proposition to sell at $395 per ton, which leaves a profit of $28 a ton. Now, the question is, What profit does that mean on the capital invested in the business? Running at two-thirds full, the output of the Bethlehem plant would be two-thirds of 12,500 tons, which, they say, is their maximum capacity, or 8,332 tons. The profit on that at $28 per ton would be $233,000. At the figures which they have given, $233,000 is 3⅓ per cent on $7,000,000, which they claim is the value of their plant. In the figures from which their cost of $367 a ton is made up is an allowance of 5 per cent as interest on the capital used in their business—that is, upon the $7,000,000—the value of their plant, and some $800,000 of working capital in the form of cash. That 5 per cent can be added to the 3⅓ per cent; so, according to the figures which have been shown by the hearings as to the costs and profit of the Bethlehem plant, running under the conditions that would prevail if we go ahead with a naval building program in accordance with the plan now being discussed, the situation would be that, after some years of running with little or no profit, they would receive a price which would enable them to have a return of 8⅓ per cent upon the money that is invested in their plant.

Mr. President, those are the figures which I have made up by taking the different items as given in the report of the hearings. On page 170 of the hearings we find a statement of Mr. Grace's own expectations in regard to this. He says:

On this basis—

Referring to the price of $395 per ton—

we could expect a return of 7⅓ per cent, applicable to depreciation and profits.

In other words, arriving at this point, as I did and as Mr. Grace does, there is a difference between us of about six-tenths of 1 per cent.

Mr. President, there are scattered through the hearings various other bits of testimony which also give us information as to the cost of making armor. On page 87 we have a statement from Mr. Dinkey, that at a price of $425 a ton, the now prevailing price, if they could run their plants full, they would make a profit of 12 per cent; but that running as they do run—that is, as they have been running lately, which is something over one-half, I believe, of their capacity—their profit is a little less than 6 per cent.

On page 170 there is another very interesting statement given under oath, which may be of interest to those who think that these naval armor plants have been gold mines for their owners. I refer to the statement made by Mr. Grace, of the Bethlehem Co., that—

We would have been far better off if we had invested the same amount of money in a good 4 per cent bond, where the interest and principal would have been secure without risk or effort on our part.

In other words, the judgment of Mr. Grace as to the value of this plant to them is that they would have been much better off if they had never built it, and had been content with the small return of 4 per cent upon the money which they have invested in it.

EXHIBIT C.

COST OF PRODUCING ARMOR PLATE UNDER VARIOUS CONDITIONS.

The production cost of armor with shop operating at full capacity has been determined as follows:

Report of Niles Board, House Document No. 193, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, $244.27 per ton.

Report of Tillman Board, House Document No. 1620, Sixty-third Congress, third session, $262.79 per ton.

(The later report reflects advances in cost of labor and material and is quite consistent with the earlier report, considering the differences in the dates at which they were made.)

With plant operating at less than full capacity, the Niles Board found that the cost would be increased as follows:

Plant operating at half capacity, cost would be increased 20 per cent.

Plant operating at one-third capacity, cost would be increased 30 per cent.

These reports give mere shop cost and do not contain many items that enter into the actual total cost, such as administrative and general expense, insurance and taxes, interest on plant investment and working capital, etc., and in the following tabulation is shown the effect of the addition of some of these very real and important items. The depreciation of the plant, although a real addition to cost, is not included below, as it is shown that prices actually received by the manufacturers has not been sufficient to allow anything for this purpose.

	Cost per ton with plant provided with sufficient contract tonnage to operate at full capacity (10,000 tons). (This is a condition that has never been maintained.)	Cost per ton with plant provided with only sufficient tonnage to operate at one-third capacity. (This approximately represents actual average conditions that have obtained.) Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LIPPITT. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I suppose the Senator is familiar with the methods by which this work is carried on by the Bethlehem

Steel Co. I confess I am not. Can the Senator state what proportion of their business is the manufacture of armor plate?

Mr. LIPPITT. It is a very small proportion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand it is 3 per cent.

Mr. LIPPITT. I was going to say that my understanding of the Bethlehem Co.'s product—I do not know whether I am correct or not—is that it is something over $100,000,000 a year. The Senator from Washington says that 3 per cent represents the proportion of their armor-plate business to their total business .

Mr. KENYON. I noticed in the paper this morning a statement——

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes; I noticed that myself.

Mr. KENYON. That the Bethlehem Steel Co. will pay 112.1 per cent. The annual report shows earnings of $17,762,812.61 for 1915, which would seem to indicate that the company itself had been doing better than the Senator figures the profits would be in the manufacture of armor. Now, what I want to get at is, how much of their business was armor-plate business?

Mr. LIPPITT. It is relatively an insignificant amount, I will say to the Senator. The Senator undoubtedly, as a careful student of the commercial columns of the press, is perfectly familiar with the marvelous revolution that has happened within a year in the value of the Bethlehem Co., due to foreign orders. I suppose he knows that the value of the stock has increased from something like $30 or $40 a share to something over $500 a share?

Mr. KENYON. In view of that fact, I can not understand the Senator's statement that the erection of an armor plant for the Government would ruin the business of some of these companies.

Mr. LIPPITT. Excuse me; I never made such a statement.

Mr. KENYON. Well, would eliminate the armor-plate business of these companies.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think it would eliminate their armor-plate business.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator thinks it will do that?

Mr. LIPPITT. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, it will not ruin the companies?

Mr. LIPPITT. Not in the slightest.

Mr. KENYON. Or affect them very materially?

Mr. LIPPITT. Or affect them very materially; in fact, I think it is a very remarkable thing, I will say to the Senator—as I have studied this question—that these companies have been willing to continue this business at all. I think the United States has been extraordinarily fortunate at this particular crisis in her history, if I may use that word with relation to affairs at the present time, to find herself with these plants in existence. I suppose it is nothing except the fact that they were valueless for scrapping that has kept them here.

I approached this subject, I will say to the Senator, absolutely without any prejudice or knowledge of it. I came to it with the supposition that I should find these companies making a handsome return and that the question involved was how great a return they would be justified in receiving. As the result of my study, I am now profoundly convinced that not only have these companies not made handsome returns on this business, but that the price that has been paid for armor by the Government is utterly insufficient; and that in the public interest, in the interest of having established here for our use at all times such plants as these, it would be far better if the Government of the United States had paid a higher price than they have paid.

Mr. KENYON. As I understand the Senator's position, then, it is that the establishment of an armor-plate factory would be detrimental to the public interest, but would not seriously affect the companies now making armor plate?

Mr. LIPPITT. I have not particularly discussed the question of what effect it would have upon these companies, and I do not think it is really of very great moment in the consideration of this subject——

Mr. KENYON. No; I do not think so, either.

Mr. LIPPITT. Because I am perfectly satisfied, looking at this question merely from the interest of the public, which it is our particular business to look at, although it is also our business to look at the interest of these gentlemen as a part of the public; but looking at it simply from the standpoint of the public interest of the great American people, excluding these particular manufacturers, I should think it would be a very shortsighted policy, indeed, which would undertake the hazards and the risks of Government manufacture where we have the manufacture of this very important article now being carried on for us by some of the most distinguished ironmasters in the world. We have all of their great experience at our service; we have their patriotism at our service; and I believe that the Government in this bill is proposing a very foolish project.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the argument has been made here, I am sure, that this would very materially injure the business of these manufacturers; but I take it now, from the Senator's argument, that that would be almost a negligible matter.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, these are very large concerns. One of these manufacturers, I think, is the Carnegie plant, which I believe is owned by the United States Steel Corporation. The United States Steel Corporation has had its one-third of these orders, which amount to in the neighborhood of 4,000 tons, at $425 a ton. What would that be? The total product of the United States Steel Corporation last year, I saw in the paper a few days ago, was something over $500,000,000. Of course, as compared with the great volume of the business of that company, this is not a vitally important thing, nor is it with the Bethlehem Co. With the Midvale Co. it is much more important, because they are not so large a concern; but the important point is this: Their property is part of the wealth of the United States. When we take the statistics of the Census Bureau to arrive at how much the wealth of the country has grown, and we read with pride that it has grown a certain number of millions or hundreds of millions or even billions of dollars, we must remember that that wealth is made up of the detailed items of the possessions of every man and corporation and farmer in the whole country, and this is part of that wealth. If we destroy it, if the United States taxes its people to raise another $20,000,000 of fresh money to put into this business—and in my opinion it will cost not less than $20,000,000—and if at the same time we are destroying twenty or thirty millions of dollars of other property which is already in existence, then the cost of this project to the people of the United States is not $20,000,000, but it is $50,000,000, for they have destroyed what they have merely to get something else that is no better in its place.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question along that line?

Mr. LIPPITT. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to see any industry destroyed, but the Senator has said that the enlarged naval program will require a great deal more armor plate to be manufactured than has been manufactured before. Now, if these companies have gotten along reasonably well—and I imagine they have; they seem to have declared pretty good dividends——

Mr. LIPPITT. The Bethlehem Co. never declared a dividend, as the Senator probably knows, until this year.

Mr. KENYON. But 112 per cent on the common stock is a pretty good dividend; is it not?

Mr. LIPPITT. It is a good start, certainly.

Mr. KENYON. We think so in our part of the country.

Mr. LIPPITT. Even in manufacturing districts we think it is a fair start.

Mr. KENYON. I should judge it was; and that was on the common stock.

Mr. LIPPITT. But the Senator, of course, knows that that is due to war conditions.

Mr. KENYON. Now, with this increased armament that must come in an increased Navy there will be that much more armor plate to be manufactured. This factory of the Government can not manufacture all of this armor plate. Why, then, can not these companies go ahead and manufacture practically as much as they ever have made before?

Mr. LIPPITT. Why, Mr. President, not only this proposed manufactory of the Government can not manufacture all of our armor plate, but it can not manufacture any of it.

Mr. KENYON. Then why do they object?

Mr. LIPPITT. It can not manufacture any of it, because if we are going to build a Navy at all—and I believe we should—then we are just as apt to need it five months from to-day as we are five years from to-day.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. LIPPITT. And I believe that the Navy ought to be constructed to whatever size we believe is adequate in the most rapid way in which the resources of this country will enable it to be built. I should hope it would all be built inside of five years, and I think it is possible to do it if the proper measures are taken to do it. Now, this Government plant will not be built in five years——

Mr. KENYON. Then this Government plant will not affect it at all.

Mr. LIPPITT. This Government plant will not supply one single armor plate to any vessel which is going to be launched within five years from this minute, I am sure; but the real answer to the Senator's question is this: After this particular emergency has passed by, after we have, under some rush and the use of all our facilities, constructed and put into operation such a Navy as we may decide upon, then there comes along merely the yearly building that is necessary for the reproduction of what may be destroyed or abandoned. That has averaged for the last 10 years about 13,000 tons a year. The capacity of this Government plant, if the requirements of this bill are conformed to, will be not less than 20,000 tons per annum. Therefore, when those conditions arrive at the end of five years, the Government plant will be able to take care of all the armor that there will be a demand for. Naturally, the Government is going to run its own armor plant. What, then, will be the condition? These people will dismantle their plants. We can not expect them to keep them insured and painted and watched for years for nothing, with no chance of use. I presume the land, if nothing else, will be of some use to them. Therefore what we are doing by this bill is to destroy what we have, which is the best in the world—the very best in the whole world, the testimony here in all these various reports agrees. They say that the armor plate which is manufactured in these plants is better than that which is manufactured anywhere else in the world. They say that the tests are higher. Not one of them questions it.

It was said away back there by Admiral O'Neil in 1900. It was said—I am going to read it to you in a minute—in the Niles report of 1906. It was said by the witnesses here a few days ago in Washington. It is not only the best quality, but we buy it at the lowest price at which any nation in the world is able to get it, and we have done it for more than 10 years. We are going to destroy the best plants in the world, so far as any testimony goes that has been presented before this body, and substitute the doubtful experiment of a Government plant, run by people who have had no experience in the armor business, but who we hope will develop it at the expense of the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the Chair.

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been unavoidably kept from the Chamber in attendance upon a committee meeting. As I entered I understood the Senator to say that we would need more armor in the future than we have in the past. As I understand, this armor is almost exclusively used in battleships. Does the Senator think we are going to authorize more than two battleships this year?

Mr. LIPPITT. Oh, Mr. President, I am looking at the present naval situation with almost a broken heart.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. LIPPITT. I had hoped that I was coming down to a session of Congress whose first business—the business that would take precedence of any other before this body—would be to provide this country with an adequate Navy. I stand here, sir, after three months and a half, and know that there has not been one single report as yet made upon what seems to me to be a vital subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I join with the Senator in the feeling that nothing has yet been done; but my impression is that the addition to the Navy will be largely in battle cruisers and in the smaller class of ships—submarines and ships of that type—rather than in battleships. I would gladly vote for more than two battleships, but I hardly think it is the program of the majority to authorize more than two during the coming year; so that we will probably not need more armor than we require at the present time, and private companies are fully equipped to furnish it.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say that I was using the terms that had been used by the Secretary of the Navy as to the requirements of armor, provided a certain naval program went through, and I was presenting to the Senate the evidence as to what profit these manufacturing plants would make if that was the case. If less armor than that is required this construction by the Government of a $20,000,000 plant is still more of an absurdity.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator has probably discussed already the subject I wish to inquire about, but I had not the good fortune to hear him. I wish to inquire as to the estimate of the Secretary of the Navy, assuming that his proposed program is carried out, regarding the tonnage requirements of armor plate during the next five years, say. I understand that the Secretary of the Navy has made out a program covering a period of five years.

Mr. LIPPITT. It requires 113,000 tons of armor plate, distributed over five years, or with wastage, perhaps 120,000 tons—an average annual consumption of, say, 24,000 tons.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now may I ask the Senator what the capacity of the existing plants is?

Mr. LIPPITT. Thirty thousand tons.

Mr. NEWLANDS. So that the existing plants are able to supply that demand and more?

Mr. LIPPITT. It is claimed that if this naval program goes through they will not run at much over two-thirds of their capacity; and yet the distinguished colleagues of the Senator over on that side of the Chamber propose to build an unlimited plant. The only provision in regard to it is that it shall produce not less than 20,000 tons a year.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And the total requirement is 24,000 tons?

Mr. LIPPITT. The total requirement is about 24,000 tons per annum; but that plant will not have anything to do with that requirement. This plant will not be in operation for three or four years, and no battleship equipped with armor produced in this Government plant could possibly be afloat five years from now; so it has nothing to do with this program. It only looks to the future. It is simply a statement to these gentlemen who are engaged in this business that just as soon as the United States can do so it is going to put them out of business. In the meantime it is going to depend upon them for this very important thing of the armor that is going on its battleships. What we ought to do is to give them every possible encouragement to go into the most extensive experiments they could think of that would be valuable to improve that armor. That is what they have been continually doing in the past. Instead of encouraging them to do that, so that we might have a Navy of the very best quality, we are telling them that just as soon as we have gotten all we can out of them we are going to throw them into the dump heap. It is not business in my part of the country. It may be in the West.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask whether or not the existing plants for the manufacture of armor plate can be used for anything else?

Mr. LIPPITT. Nothing at all. When they are not making armor plate they are shut up.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Can the Senator state what has been the total cost of these plants that produce 24,000 tons per annum?

Mr. LIPPITT. The total cost of them is in excess of their present inventory valuation, because a large amount of machinery has been thrown away on account of its being replaced by improved machinery. The present reproduction value of these plants would probably be in the neighborhood of $25,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been put as high as $30,000,000, I think.

Mr. LIPPITT. And it has been put as high as $30,000,000. The Bethlehem people, who have the largest plant, say that they inventoried their plant for their own purposes at $7,000,000, but they say it could not be reproduced at that price.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Assuming that to-morrow the Government itself should be able to enter upon the manufacture of armor plate sufficient to meet the requirements of its entire Navy, to what use could those plants be put, whose reproductive value would be, I will say, $30,000,000?

Mr. LIPPITT. No use whatever. They would be destroyed. Oh, they could be scrapped, of course, and the material could be used at the value of scrap material, and I presume some small portions of them might be converted; but they would have to be substantially scrapped.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I presume the buildings could be used, could they not?

Mr. LIPPITT. No; I am told that they could not. If the Senator will take the trouble to look at this report and simply to look at these pictures that are in it, showing the enormous size of the units that have to be used in this industry, he will see they have to be able to handle single pieces of iron that weigh over 300,000 pounds. It is no piano wire that is being made when you are handling units of that kind. These pictures show some of these immense ingots, and will give the Senator some idea of the enormous size of the buildings and the special kinds of buildings that have to be used for this purpose. It is a special plant.

Mr. President, I have now discussed the question of costs. I want to say just a word, while I am on this question of prices, in regard to one point which has been frequently referred to in this debate, and which has been referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts—a point that I think anybody considering this subject should put in the foremost part of his consideration of it—and that is the fact of the comparative price paid for armor by the United States and by these foreign countries.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island further yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LIPPITT. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator what has been the highest and what the lowest price charged by these armor-plate plants for armor plate?

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, on page 7 of the hearings the Senator will find the prices charged each year from 1887 down to 1915. I believe they vary from $520, as my eye runs over them, to one year when they were $346; 1906 was the year in which the price was the lowest, and since then it was $420 until 1913, when the eight-hour law went into effect, which added 50 per cent to the cost of the labor employed in these factories, and the price went up to $454. It is now at $425, and the companies offer to make the armor under the new conditions of adequate employment at $395.

When I was interrupted, Mr. President, I was just starting to call attention to the comparative prices in this country and abroad; and it is such an illuminating suggestion, when you remember the different prices of labor in this country and in these foreign countries, the different conditions under which manufacturing has been carried on in this new country, that to my mind it is a very weighty consideration.

In the Niles report of 1906, on page 18, there is a little history on this subject of foreign prices. It says that up to 1896 the prices paid for armor in this country were about 25 per cent higher than the prices abroad; that in 1896, 20 years ago, the prices in this country were closely on a par with those abroad; and it furnishes a table of the prices in existence at the time of this report, in 1906, 10 years ago. That was the year when the United States bought its armor at the lowest price it ever paid for it, $346. But even taking the present price of $425, it shows that we were paying more than $250 a ton less than it was costing England at that time. It cost England $681. We were paying $250 less than it cost France. We were paying $125 a ton less than it cost Germany, and $225 a ton less than it cost Italy—just one-half, in fact.

Mr. President, the conditions that existed at that time of our buying our armor at only about one-half what was paid by foreign nations have continued to this time. On page 7 of the committee hearings there is also a statement of the prices paid here and abroad for armor, which I will ask permission to have printed in connection with my remarks, without reading. It shows that we are practically to-day, as we have been for 10 years back, buying armor at a materially lower price than any other first-class nation in the world, or in fact any nation in the world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. LIPPITT. We next come to the question of quality. After all is said and done that is the one matter that we ought to bear in mind in considering this subject. It is not a vital matter to the United States whether they pay $25 or $30 or $50 a ton more or less for their armor. It is a very vital matter whether or not they get the best quality. I simply want to call attention to the uniform testimony, running all through these reports, away back to 1898, 18 years ago, of approval of the quality of the armor that has been put upon the ships of the American Navy, given by representatives of the Navy Department and representatives of the Government in various ways.

I have here, from the testimony of Admiral O'Neil, who was then the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, on February 2, 1898, a very elaborate statement, covering several pages, of armor tests abroad made by various nations, giving all the details of them; and he then sums up as follows:

My convictions are that the armor manufactured in this country is fully equal to the best service armor as manufactured abroad; that the tests heretofore applied have been such as to secure a high standard, and that they are as severe as those heretofore applied abroad, and represent more fully the actual quality of the armor supplied.

He goes on, in other language, approving the quality of our armor.

Again, in the Niles report, on November 16, 1906, when Mr. Truman H. Newberry was Acting Secretary of the Navy, on page 26, it is said:

The board finds that in no other country are the requirements of inspection and ballistic tests more severe than in the United States, and in most instances are distinctly less so. The methods of inspection and test differ widely. Here the manufacture of each individual plate is under constant surveillance of Government inspectors, and periodically during the course of manufacture plates are selected from small lots of finished and service plates for ballistic test as representative of the armor made. In most foreign countries the manufacturer submits sample plates that have withstood certain ballistic tests. The purchaser makes a selection of the quality of armor desired from these sample plates, and the manufacturer endeavors to fill the order given with armor of the same quality as that in the selected plate.

Then, again, in the present hearings, simply duplicating the testimony that has appeared here at intervals over the last 16 years, on page 41, Mr. Grace says:

I do not think there is any question about the quality of armor that the United States Government is receiving.

And so on. Mr. President, I will ask that these extracts, showing the high quality of American armor, be printed in my remarks without reading them in full.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

QUALITY.

(Feb. 2, 1898, Senate hearing; O'Neil.)

After an elaborate statement of armor tests abroad, sums up: "My convictions are that the armor manufactured in this country is fully equal to the best service armor as manufactured abroad; that the tests heretofore applied have been such as to secure a high standard; and that they are as severe as those heretofore applied abroad and represent more fully the actual quality of the armor supplied. More so than does the method of testing in vogue in England; that the armor presented in this country would have withstood tests considerably more severe than those to which it was subjected; and that the tests are and have been reasonable to the contractors and so drawn as to carefully protect the interests of the Government. In the specifications recently prepared, which it is proposed to use in case of future contracts, a new table of velocities has been inserted making the tests more severe than heretofore."

(Niles report, Nov. 16, 1906; Truman H. Newberry, Acting Secretary, p. 26.)

The board finds that in no other country are the requirements of inspection and ballistic tests more severe than in the United States, and in most instances are distinctly less so. The methods of inspection and test differ widely. Here the manufacture of each individual plate is under constant surveillance of Government inspectors and periodically during the course of manufacture plates are selected from small lots of finished and service plates for ballistic test as representative of the armor made. In most foreign countries the manufacturer submits sample plates that have withstood certain ballistic tests. The purchaser makes a selection of the quality of armor desired from these sample plates, and the manufacturer endeavors to fill the order given with armor of the same quality as that in the selected plate.

I do not think there as any question about the quality of armor that the United States Government is receiving. They have a higher specification than any foreign country that we know of to-day. We are manufacturing, in other words, armor plate to the highest specifications. You take England, for instance. They make an armor plate, submit it to the Government, and if it is satisfactory the Government says, "Make the rest like that plate." We make 600 tons of armor in a group, and submit the whole group to the United States Government, and they select the poorest plate out of it to the best of their knowledge. * * * It occurred to me along that line that if this industry was controlled absolutely by the United States Government you would have the purchaser inspecting its own products and accepting it for use. I can not quite conceive that they would be as rigid in making condemnations as they are with a private manufacturer.

The chief and all-important exponent of the quality of armor is its ballistic resistance against actual attack by gun fire, and the increasing demands upon manufacturers in this regard have been the incentive to them and to others to experiment with new methods of manufacture. With every increase in ballistic resistance demanded has come to the manufacturer a certain increase in the cost of production. The value of material has increased and the difficulties of manufacture multiplied while the rate and certainty of production has markedly lessened. In no branch of steel making is greater nicety of manipulation and treatment required than in the production of armor plate.

Mr. LIPPITT. Another very important consideration in this matter is the cost of the plant that it is proposed to build. There is provided in the bill an appropriation of $11,000,000. The Secretary is not limited to that $11,000,000, and there is no evidence of any kind presented to show that that will be the maximum cost of the plant. On the contrary, there is ample evidence from a number of different sources to demonstrate that the plant will cost very much more. In fact, the Tillman report itself, from which that figure of $11,000,000 is taken, says on page 7:

It is not considered that these estimates are sufficiently accurate to enable the erection of such a plant to be proceeded with. * * * Before proceeding with the erection of a plant, a well-known consulting engineer, familiar with this class of work and with the laying out of a factory, should be consulted.

In other words, the report itself is not sufficiently confident of its figures to advise that they be accepted as final. Those figures were made up about a year ago. Since then, as everybody knows, there has been an enormous increase in the price of steel products. I came across a memorandum here a day or two ago in the Boston News Bureau which stated that on many steel products to-day the price in Pittsburgh was the highest that was ever known.

But we have other testimony on this question of plant cost. Mr. Grace, of the Bethlehem Co., on page 140, referring to the cost of this plant, says that he had his engineers prepare an estimate of what it would cost to build a plant of 20,000 tons, and that, while he had it not then with him and could not give the exact figures, "it is somewhere between $14,000,000 and $15,000,000."

He said at another place, on page 171, that plants as estimated by the Tillman committee can not be built at this time for anything like the figures they have submitted.

He also says that "we just as firmly believe that in a Government-operated plant armor can not be made, even by running the plant full, for $262 a ton."

Mr. Dinkey, who represents the Midvale people, at page 139, testified that an estimate that called for the construction of a 20,000-ton plant for $11,000,000 "would have to overrun a very great deal."

Mr. President, nobody has appeared in favor of the construction of this plant anywhere as a witness before the committee except the Secretary of the Navy and Admiral Strauss. The testimony of the Secretary of the Navy is that we ought not to build a plant of over 10,000 tons capacity. He repeated that several times. His original estimates were for a plant of 10,000 tons capacity.

This committee has given us no information of any kind to show why they have recommended a plant of 20,000 tons instead of one of 10,000 tons. They simply say "it suffices to say." That is all the knowledge we have on the subject. The committee declares it suffices to say that the majority of the committee are in favor of this plan.

Admiral Strauss in his testimony was asked what the benefit would be to the Government of having this plant, and on page 145 he replied:

If the private firms will furnish armor at a fair profit, and will continue to do so under all conditions, I see no especial advantage to the Government in going into the business. It all depends upon what the fair price is.

Senator PENROSE. Is it only a question of price? Is that the only question now that is disturbing the Government?

Admiral STRAUSS. I think so.

Senator PENROSE. Would it not be unfortunate if the Government went into this business and the private concerns went out, not only for the progress of the art but for the needs of the Government?

Admiral STRAUSS. I think it is well for the Government to have competition in producing munitions as well as anyone else. I think Government factories need competition in order to stir them on, both as to quality and price.

In other words, the testimony of the only expert witness who appeared in favor of this bill is that there is no benefit to the Government except a question of price, and that, of course, is a matter that might very reasonably be arranged by special negotiations between the Secretary of the Navy and the owners of these plants. As I have already said, they have, in consideration of existing conditions, expressed their willingness to reduce their price from $425 to $395 a ton.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator has stated that the only object testified to by experts on behalf of the Government was as to the question of cost. He will find, on page 146——

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will allow me, he is going to refer to Admiral Strauss's correction.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIPPITT. I meant to say, but forgot it in reading the testimony, that on a page farther on Admiral Strauss said that he wished to correct his testimony saying that the only benefit to the Government would be in the price by saying that he thought also there might be some additional knowledge gained in regard to the quality of the plate.

I think that is what the Senator referred to.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; that is it. He says also the Government plan will probably improve the quality of the armor.

Mr. LIPPITT. Does he say "probably"?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will read it, so as to be exact, if the Senator will permit me:

I would like to amend the answer and say, besides the advantage of cost, if we had a Government plant we would be able to set a pace as to quality—I think there is a chance of that—that we would be able to make better demands as to quality.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think there is a "chance," he says.

Mr. PITTMAN. I used the word "probably."

Mr. LIPPITT. He scarcely used the word "probably." I admit there is a chance of it, but I think there is a much greater chance that with the Government project it will be worse than they are now getting. Of course, it is manifest to anybody who will give this a minute's consideration that when the Government makes all its armor under the control of the Navy Department and then tests that armor, also under the control of the Navy Department, there may be a little desire to pass that armor without being too critical. We would always have the fear back in our hearts that perhaps something had been overlooked lest there should be a scandal in the Navy Department. When this armor is made by a private individual and tested by the representatives of the purchaser, who have only one undivided interest, and that is to get the best quality possible, we know, as far as human ingenuity can provide for it, that we have surrounded it with the very best test that can be applied.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LIPPITT. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has not read the investigation of 1895 and 1896 in this business, when Carnegie and Schwab acknowledged they had put off blowhole armor and all sorts of trash. I will get the report.

Mr. LIPPITT. I know all about that. I have the report.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why did you not mention it, then?

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator had already mentioned it in one of his illuminating addresses on the subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator was proceeding to say that a private individual would never put off any fraud on the Government.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not think I said that.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is the substance.

Mr. LIPPITT. It was not the substance or the essence or anything like what I said. What I said was that if they attempted to do it we would have the best guaranty that human ingenuity could devise in knowing that it would be inspected by the very department that had one undivided interest. The Senator refers to one particular case. I do not know of any occasion in this discussion for reviving the scandals of the last century. That occurred 20 years ago. But as long as the Senator wants to bring it up, I will state that what happened there was that charges were made against, I think, the Carnegie plant that there had been a conspiracy between the inspectors of the Government and the employees of the plant, so that some bad armor had been passed on the Government; that the Government employees and the employees of the plant had been working together. Congress passed a resolution fining the company for its operation. I presume it was of very doubtful legality. Anyway, for some reasons that were conclusive and satisfactory, the only Democratic President who has ever sat in the presidential chair in whose sincerity the American people had entire confidence remitted that fine and said it was not justifiable. The fine was not paid because the President said it ought not to be paid.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. POMERENE. It has been stated several times on the floor of the Senate that one of these companies, at least, threatened that if the Government constructed an armor-plate plant they would immediately raise the price of armor plate $200 a ton. If these companies are likely to take advantage of the Government in its extremity and increase the price of armor plate $200 a ton, or perhaps 50 per cent over and above what they are getting now, what assurance have we that they will not take advantage of the Government in the matter of the quality of the armor plate?

Mr. LIPPITT. We have this security, that the armor plate is passed by a Government inspector who is in the works at any and all times and has a chance to inspect every plate.

Mr. POMERENE. Does not the Senator think that if the Government went to the expense of putting up an armor plant and was manufacturing armor plate it would see to it that there were experts there to look after the Government's interests just as well as if it was manufactured by a private concern?

Mr. LIPPITT. No; I do not.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, I must differ from the Senator.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have just stated my belief on that point. I do not know whether the Senator has just come in or whether he was here at the time.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; I think I heard the Senator's statement.

Mr. LIPPITT. Of course, in one case there is the same master to both men, the Secretary of the Navy. In the other case the interests are not combined in any way.

Mr. POMERENE. I can hardly think it would be possible to any very great extent, at least, that men who were in the employ of the United States Government would deliberately set about to defraud the Government by imposing upon it a quality of armor plate which was below that required by the specifications. It is possible but not probable.

Mr. LIPPITT. I am delighted to know the Senator from Ohio has such confidence in the Government officers.

Mr. POMERENE. In that instance they would have no private interest to serve whatsoever; they would be serving the Government itself.

Mr. LIPPITT. If I wanted to go into that, I would like to open up this book and show you the opposite, but the time is passing and I should like to finish my remarks——

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator——

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me, I wish he would give this question of quality as manufactured in private plants and in Government his very best thought. This is not a partisan question; it is a business question, a very important business question; and I do not think it is necessary for us to stand and discuss it here, either I as a Republican or you as a Democrat. I hope it is not.

But what I want the Senator to think of is this, that in these private plants it so happens that in the overseeing departments there is the greatest ability that has even been known in that industry. Mr. Schwab, at the head of the Bethlehem plant, and Judge Gary, at the head of the United States Steel Corporation, are recognized as foremost experts in those industries. They have under them an almost unlimited staff, who are experimenting in iron manufacture of all kinds, not merely in iron manufacture for the purpose of making armor plate, but for the purpose of meeting very many other important and delicate requirements. Does it not stand to the Senator's reason—it does to mine—that the opportunity for improvement in armor in the hands of such men who are constantly experimenting in other similar directions might be much greater than in the hands of men who had no opportunity to experiment except in one direction? I can not imagine that there is anything in the Government uniform which makes a man's intelligence so much greater that with less opportunity he can produce better results.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there can be no difference between the Senator and myself upon the one proposition that we want the very best quality of armor plate we can get.

Mr. LIPPITT. Irrespective of cost.

Mr. POMERENE. Unquestionably. I have not any objection to any plant making a reasonable amount of money. That does not disturb me. But I have been satisfied, from the investigation I have made on this subject, that the Government has been at times at least paying vastly more than it should pay. I can not understand——

Mr. LIPPITT. What time——

Mr. POMERENE. Just a moment. I can not understand why an American firm that has grown up and prospered under the American Government could charge a foreign Government less for its armor plate than it does the home Government. That is one of the things that has appealed to me and has had very great force with me. I deny the political morals, the business morals of any firm that will come to the Government and make a threat that it will charge $200 a ton more for armor plate than it is charging now.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, just at that point——

Mr. POMERENE. Just a moment.

Mr. LIPPITT. When did that occur?

Mr. POMERENE. I have been informed——

Mr. LIPPITT. One of these——

Mr. POMERENE. I have been informed by two members of the committee that this threat was made in the committee room itself.

Mr. LIPPITT. In looking over the testimony, I do not find it.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know that it appears there. I have accepted the statement of Senators in whom I have every confidence, and that is the statement that they made.

Mr. LIPPITT. You have more confidence in their statement than in this record?

Mr. TILLMAN. I can settle that matter right here. Here is the evidence, if the Senator from Rhode Island will hear it.

Mr. LIPPITT. All right.

Mr. TILLMAN. I send to the desk and ask to have read the marked——

Mr. LIPPITT. Just wait one minute. How long is that?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is very short, but this is the purport. It is the testimony of the correspondent of the Manufacturers' Record of Baltimore, a reputable journal. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. LIPPITT. I will not.

Mr. TILLMAN. You do not believe in it?

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not know anything about newspaper——

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not a newspaper. It is a business magazine. The Senator has been discussing business men's integrity and honor and all that sort of thing.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow this to be read?

Mr. LIPPITT. No. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. I will put it in later.

Mr. LIPPITT. I hope you will.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LIPPITT. In just one minute and then I will yield. The Senator from South Carolina when these gentlemen appeared before his committee, under the protest of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], took the unusual course of swearing every one of these witnesses. He refused to accept any of their testimony unless it was sworn testimony. That is a very unusual thing in a congressional hearing, though it is not unprecedented. He now wants me to accept something in a magazine which is not a newspaper. I do not know anything about that. It is not official in any way. He tries to make out that it is the testimony of these people. He can put it in in his own time.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is very unfair and unjust, too. I have tried to make out nothing. I have asked if you did not recognize the Manufacturers' Record as a reputable magazine, one to be relied on?

Mr. LIPPITT. I suppose it is.

Mr. TILLMAN. Say yes or no.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not have to say yes or no.

Mr. TILLMAN. You do not have to, but fairness and decency demand that you shall say yes or no.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator must be very careful. As to what decency demands, I am to judge, and not he.

Mr. TILLMAN. I apologize to the Senator.

Mr. LIPPITT. That is all right. I will say to the Senator that I know very little about the Manufacturers' Record.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a business magazine devoted to the development of southern industries.

Mr. LIPPITT. I say I have very little knowledge of it, but the knowledge I do have leads me to believe it is a publication of high standing. But I do not care to accept that sort of testimony.

Mr. OLIVER rose.

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I just wish to say that I am rather sorry to see the Senator refuse to allow the Senator from South Carolina to say anything he wants about this, because he is the sponsor for the bill, and this is the first time—at the eleventh hour—when he has risen in advocacy of it since it has been reported, and it is the first time anybody has wished to present any argument in its favor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, that is very unkind of my friend from Pennsylvania, because he knows my health is so poor that I can not do much debating.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not reflecting on the Senator from South Carolina. I am reflecting upon everybody who has proposed to crowd through this important measure—this unprecedented revolutionary measure—without even the form of debating it upon its merits.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will allow me, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] brought up a subject, which we were diverted from a minute ago, in regard to——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was with relation to that I desire to remind the Senator of something. It is only a short time ago——

Mr. LIPPITT. In regard to the question of foreign selling?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No.

Mr. LIPPITT. Then, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will yield to me very kindly, only a short time ago the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], on the floor of the Senate to-day made an open declaration that if the Government went on and constructed this armor-plate factory the private manufacturers would undoubtedly raise the price of their armor.

Mr. LIPPITT. No; he did not say that. He said that they would undoubtedly be justified in raising it, and that is very different.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; he defended it. I think that is the evident meaning.

Mr. LIPPITT. He did not know anything about what the manufacturers would do——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That the Government of the United States would be in a plight to get armor, and that the private manufacturers would raise the price——

Mr. LIPPITT. No; that they would be justified in raising it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me finish. That they would raise the price $200 a ton. In reply to that I called attention to the fact that if they did that the United States could defend itself by purchasing armor from abroad. So that evidently was the meaning of what the Senator from Massachusetts said.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is about the Chamber somewhere. He was here a few minutes ago. It was he who made the statement.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the Senator allow me just a moment? I think I can settle this thing so far as the intention of one of the manufacturers is concerned. I am authorized by one of these concerns, whose representative visited me a day or two ago, to say that that concern has no intention whatever of making any change in the price at which it proposes to sell armor plate to the Government, no matter what the action should be with regard to this bill; that they will sell it at the same price at which they would have sold it if the legislation had not been enacted. That comes direct to me from the management of the Midvale Steel Co.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That certainly is very cheerful and very sane.

Mr. LIPPITT. And very patriotic.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is a very sensible, a very sane, and a very patriotic statement; but it utterly disposes of the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts that we should not construct this plant because we would be in a desperate strait to get armor.

Mr. OLIVER. He supplemented that statement also by saying under ordinary conditions he thought that they would be justified in adding to the price such sum as would partially compensate them for rendering their plants useless by this legislation, but considering the position in which the country stood to-day he did not believe it would be a patriotic move, and that this legislation would make no difference in the price at which at present they would furnish armor plate to the Government.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to say just a word in reply to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], who seems to be very much impressed by the fact that at certain times in the history of the last 20 years armor plate has been sold abroad by some of these companies at a less price than it was then being sold to the United States Government. I presume the Senator from Ohio knows all the circumstances which accompanied those sales. He probably knows, if he does not I should like to impress upon him the fact, that those sales were advertising sales, sample sales, made for the purpose of seeing whether the plants that were idle from the lack of demand on the part of the only consumer in this country, the National Government, could find an outlet abroad. They sold small quantities just the same as a dry goods dealer here in Washington. If you should write to Woodward & Lothrop a letter saying that you want a sample of shirting it would be sent to you for nothing. In the same way they sent off samples abroad to see if they could build up a business. That is the only way, as a rule, in which a new merchant is able to get his goods into the hands of the consumer. It is not selling as a regular thing great quantities of material to other parties. In one case where this was done, in the case of Russia——

Mr. POMERENE. At $249 a ton.

Mr. LIPPITT. The price of the first lot they sent was $249 a ton, and then they got as a result of that a price of $524 a ton, which was very much greater than they were charging this Government for the armor.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator mean to say that they sold a sample to Russia for $249 a ton and then they later made a larger shipment at over $500 per ton?

Mr. LIPPITT. They made a shipment a little later at $549 a ton. So the Senator will find on page 12 of the hearings——

Mr. POMERENE. I have page 151. I was referring to the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. LIPPITT. On page 12 the Senator will find a full record of it. I should like to have that paper printed with my remarks as illustrating the trifling character of the Government business and the nature of it.

Mr. POMERENE. I can not well understand why a manufacturer would sell a sample at the price of $249 a ton and when it came to the principal shipment charge over $500 a ton. It does not look quite reasonable to me.

Mr. LIPPITT. To me it looks very reasonable. In the first shipment, I have no doubt if it had been necessary they might have presented that first sample to the Russian Government to see if they could get some business there. It would have been good merchandising, possibly, to have done that. The Senator knows perfectly well that whenever a man now introduces an article to a discriminating purchaser it is sometimes necessary for the new producer to offer him a little lower price. There is nothing unusual about it.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LIPPITT. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator referred in a response to an inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina with reference to the investigation made in 1894, I think it was, of the Carnegie Steel Co., that the subsequent fine that was imposed upon them for defrauding the Government in the manufacture of armor plate, which I think was $600,000, was remitted. Is the Senator quite certain that the whole fine was remitted?

Mr. LIPPITT. I took that statement from——

Mr. KENYON. My recollection is that——

Mr. LIPPITT. My authority for that is the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish the Senator from Rhode Island would get the whole speech I made on that occasion and put it in.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have the Senator's whole speech right here.

Mr. TILLMAN. The whole speech I made in 1897?

Mr. LIPPITT. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. When I opened up that fraud of the Carnegie Co.——

Mr. LIPPITT. I have the Senator's speech made in the Senate here December 13, and in the course of that speech he quoted from a speech made at an earlier day upon the subject of antediluvian scandal. He says, in regard to President Cleveland, that—

> Mr. Carnegie was fined by the Secretary of the Navy and, by some hokus-pokus, this glorious President of ours, who, God be thanked, goes out of power in two days from now, remitted that fine.

He remitted that fine, and he was thanking God that President Cleveland, the only Democratic President they have heretofore had since 1861, was about to go out of office. I do not know how he may feel next March.

Mr. KENYON. I think it is a fact, however, that the fine was reduced to $140,000, as I remember, and that amount was paid; but I am not certain.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should have made that statement, but I have not looked at it with care. It was not, of course, an important matter under present conditions and it occurred 20 years ago, and it has no bearing upon the present conditions of armor manufacture.

Mr. President, I was talking about the cost of a plant. I have been interrupted so much that I am not exactly sure whether I covered all the points I had in my mind to analyze, but if I have done so I have shown to the Senate that under the prices the present manufacturers have proposed to the Government for the supply, under the conditions that are likely to exist in the next four years, if the naval program is carried out, it is a price $30 less than they have been receiving for armor plate under the conditions of production that have recently existed, and they would make a profit, according to the sworn figures, of 7½ per cent in one method of figuring and of 8⅓ per cent in another way of figuring it.

I have shown that we have in this country armor plate of the very highest type sold to our Government at a materially less price than any other Government in the world is able to buy it for. I have shown that in this proposed Government plant for the purpose of building armor there is no indication of what it is going to cost; that it would be impossible for it to be produced within such time as would enable a vessel to be added to our Navy, at least within five years, and I believe it would be nearer seven.

I will close my remarks by simply adding to what I have already said the statement that it seems to me this bill is one of the most unwise and unnecessary from a business standpoint that I have ever seen presented to this body since I have been a member of it.

I do not believe that under the method proposed the Government would save any money at all. I believe that it would materially imperil the vital point in connection with this whole subject; and that is, the quality of our armor; that we now have plants the quality of whose product is unquestioned; that that is the vital point in connection with this whole matter, and not the question of whether armor plate costs a few dollars per ton more or less. I therefore hope the bill will fail.

APPENDIX 1.

[Senate Report No. 115, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session.]

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany S. 1417:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was refererd the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it with an amendment.

The relation of the United States Government to the armor-plate manufacturers has been a continual source of dissatisfaction to those Members of Congress who really do not believe in the doctrine of favoritism to special interests, or in the protective system at all, and a condition has existed little short of scandalous. From 1887, when Secretary Whitney made the first contract with the Bethlehem Co., to 1915, when Secretary Daniels refused to award any contracts at all, investigation has followed investigation without result.

The very nature of the armor-plate business makes such a condition inevitable. There is only one customer in the United States for the product—the Government—and the large capital required to found an armor plant excludes all but the largest concerns from the business.

There are only three manufacturers of armor plate in this country, and the result is either a monopoly or a combine of the worst type. None of the conditions that tend to check monopoly are present. The number of manufacturers is necessarily limited and the Government is compelled to buy their product, regardless of the price charged, because the law does not allow the Secretary of the Navy to go outside of this country to buy it. The manufacturers have no fear of private competition, for there is not sufficient demand for armor to justify the entrance of other parties. The economic principle which declares that to increase the price of a monopolistic product beyond a certain limit automatically decreases the demand for it does not obtain, because the United States Government is compelled to armor its vessels, regardless of cost. It is plain that Congress can pass as many laws as it chooses to pass and give the Secretary of the Navy as much discretion as he may ask without remedying the situation. As long as present conditions continue the armor manufacturers are in a position to force the United States Government, in the language of the highwayman, to "stand and deliver."

The committee has no desire to criticize unjustly the manufacturers of armor plate. They have done no more than most other men would have done under similar circumstances and temptations. Men in the pursuit of wealth are essentially greedy and hoggish; and the protective principle seems to have been prolific in producing some magnificent specimens. The main fact to be borne in mind is that they have more power than is compatible with the public interest. Give power to any set of men, however excellent and honorable, and sooner or later they will abuse it. Men have been built that way since the beginning of time.

The history of armor-plate making in America is interesting and significant in view of the foregoing observations.

The change from wooden ships to ships of iron and steel was authorized by the act of August 5, 1882, which orders—

"That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs shall exceed 30 per cent of the estimated cost of a new ship of the same size and like material."

Secretary of the Navy W. E. Chandler really began the new Navy, for he made the contract with the John Roach Co. for the first four iron ships—the Atlanta, Baltimore, Chicago, and Dolphin. The Dolphin is still in active service as a dispatch boat, showing how thoroughly well it must have been built. It is now about 33 years old.

The next step was to get armor for these iron vessels. There was no armor being manufactured at all in the United States; the armor for the Miantonomoh having been imported from England at a cost of about $550 per ton. Secretary Whitney induced the Bethlehem Co. to enter upon the manufacture of armor, it having one of the largest iron plants in the country; and the price agreed on varied from five to six hundred dollars per ton. The Bethlehem Co. and the Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. were the only two concerns that bid at all. Whitney did not make a close or tight bargain, as he knew the company must necessarily be put to large expense, and he was willing to allow a liberal price on that account. He felt that it was desirable, if not absolutely necessary, that we should have armor manufacturers in the United States; and his successor, Mr. Tracy, felt that there should be more than one concern in the business, and he induced the Carnegie Steel Co. to enter it. There was a dispute with the Carnegie Co. about the price. Mr. Carnegie insisted he must receive the same price the Bethlehem people were getting or he would not touch it. Secretary Whitney further agreed for each pound of armor plate used he would set aside 2 cents to indemnify the company for any damages it might sustain for infringing on certain patents held by the Schneider Co. in France.

Having reason to believe the Carnegie and Bethlehem companies were in collusion or combination, Senator Chandler offered a resolution in the Senate instructing the committee as follows:

"To inquire whether the prices paid or agreed to be paid for armor for vessels of the Navy have been fair and reasonable; also whether any prices paid have been increased on account of patent processes used for the introduction of nickel, or for cementation by the Harvey process; and if so, whether the increases in price are fair and reasonable; whether the issuance of any of the patents was expedited at the request of the Navy Department; whether such patents were properly issued and were for inventions not previously known or used, and who were and are the owners of such patents; whether any officers of the Government were interested therein, or at the time when any contracts were made were or have since been interested in the patents or employed by the owners thereof; and whether any legislation is necessary to further promote the manufacture and cheapen the price of armor for vessels of the Navy."

This resolution passed the Senate on December 31, 1895, and under it the first senatorial investigation of armor was begun.

The first bill for the erection of an armor-plate factory was introduced on January 22, 1896, by Senator Smith, of New Jersey. This bill provided that the factory be erected in the city of Washington.

Secretary Herbert, on January 5, 1897, stated in reference to the Bethlehem plant, basing his estimates on data obtained from the company itself, that—

"Whatever may have been the cost of the armor plant and the gun plant, whatever may have been paid for the secrets of manufacture or for patents, or whatever may have been interest on working capital, all those and other charges have been paid from the gross earnings of the company; and the results show the company's investments in the plant to make armor and gun steel for the Government have been returned with 22 per cent thereon."

According to Secretary Herbert, in seven years the plant had paid for itself and in addition had returned 22 per cent of itself, and practically the same statement was made of the Carnegie Co. These facts prove the assertion often made by Senator TILLMAN—that the Government had built the plants and then given them to those two companies.

Secretary Daniels, in his current report, states:

"Since the passage of the naval act of June 7, 1900, the Navy Department has spent $76,195,960 for armor for its ships. It is believed that if the intent of Congress to order the erection of a factory had been carried out at that time the Government would have saved enough money on armor plate to own a plant as large as that owned by all three of the private companies and in the meantime to have supplied the armor plate for its own ships at a less price than it has been compelled to pay."

The facts as brought out go to prove this beyond dispute.

In 1903 the Midvale Steel Co. entered the field, but its entry has made no material difference in the situation as to cost of armor to the Government. Of course they were lured by the hope of profit. Being skillful metallurgists and iron masters, just by walking through the Bethlehem and Carnegie works they could see that the profits were large. But that company did not build an armor plant until they had bid five times and were denied participation in the contracts because they did not have any plant in which to manufacture it. They had underbid the older companies, but the Government, for some unexplained reason, though ostensibly it was because the President or the Secretary of the Navy elected to believe that the new company could not build a plant and deliver the armor in accordance with their contract, gave the awards to Bethlehem and Carnegie.

Mr. Barba, then president of the Midvale Steel Co., stated to the Tillman committee that "I remember that our original bid contemplated beginning delivery in 26 months, during which time we hoped to be able to erect a plant that would enable us to begin delivery of the comparatively small sizes of armor which were required for the purposes of the Navy at that time." When Mr. Barba was asked, "Didn't you believe that Carnegie and Bethlehem had a good thing, and therefore you wanted to share in it?" answered, "Unquestionably." To show the bias of the Navy Department in favor of Carnegie and Bethlehem, Mr. Barba testified that the Midvale Co. received about one-third of the amount—16,000 tons—needed by the department, at $397 per ton, and two-thirds was given to the Carnegie and Bethlehem companies, at $450.60 per ton.

After having been turned down five times, the construction of a plant was begun by the Midvale Co. in 1903 and has progressed so far toward completion that the Secretary of the Navy awarded them a contract, they being the lowest bidder. So far so good; this was honest competition. But once in they were recognized by the old companies, who took them in partnership, as it were, for thereafter the price offered by each of the three did not materially vary.

The effort of the Government to obtain competition among armor makers had failed. It should be said to the credit of the Midvale Co., however, that they refused to pay a royalty to either Harvey or Krupp and defended a suit through all the courts up to the United States Supreme Court, which sustained their contention that they had done nothing for which to pay a royalty.

When the special committee, consisting of Senator TILLMAN, Congressman PADGETT, and Admiral Strauss, investigated the whole subject last year, that committee could not obtain any authoritative or reliable information whatever as to the cost of armor. There was every evidence of combination and collusion instead of competition, but no proof. But given three companies with a single fixed purchaser of their products, a consumer who is compelled to buy, and monopoly or combination, tacit or avowed, is certain to follow. The nature of the case excludes proof in a judicial sense of the term, but it invites an unerring moral conviction.

Secretary Daniels, in his last report and in his statement before the Senate Naval Committee, said the three bids in the last "competition" agreed to a cent.

The hearing before the committee brought out no new facts. The armor men of 1916 showed the same capacity for talking without saying anything as that exhibited so artistically by their brethren of earlier years. "The same talk of the 'value of trade secrets'; the same reluctance to talk cost of production; the same plea of having been encouraged by the Government to go into the business and the consequent unfairness of Government competition; the same inability to recognize them if such a quasi partnership as they claim exists between them and the Government they should, in all fairness, shoulder its liabilities as well as insist on its benefits; indeed, about the only material difference between the hearings of 1916 and those other numerous ones that have followed each other so regularly and so fruitlessly since 1895 is that of dates. To go into these reports would be a waste of time. They are published in pamphlet form and can be easily obtained by interested parties from the document room. The hearings before the Senate committee on this subject are also obtainable, as they have been printed."

It suffices to say that the committee is of the opinion that the Government has been charged unreasonable prices for its armor plate, and that the only remedy lies in the Government owning and operating a plant, as provided for in Senate bill 1417. Should the Government build it and then lock it up, and it never be used, it would be wise to erect it, as it would serve as a warning to private manufacturers that there is a point beyond which the Government will not be driven and where patience ceases to be a virtue.

The committee, therefore, by a vote of 9 to 3 of those present, ordered the bill reported favorably, and expresses the hope that it will soon become a law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it would be easy, I think, to show how much of misinformation, or lack of information, and how inconsequential and illogical is the speech to which we have just listened, but I do not propose to address myself to that at all. However, utilizing the liberality of the rules of the Senate, which permit a Senator to talk about anything he pleases if he has the floor, I propose to discuss another phase of the preparedness situation. It is of much importance to the Navy from a broad, national point of view.

Mr. President, for some reason—I do not know what, nor do I know why it is so—the Charleston Navy Yard for many years past has been a target for misrepresentation and falsehood. Its enemies have not hesitated to hire newspaper writers, writers in yellow journals and magazines, to flyblow and lie about it. Even friendly writers in magazines are sometimes careless in their statements. For instance, the current Leslie's Weekly, March 16, has specialized on Charleston, and its editor, F. J. Splitstone, has written very entertainingly, and evidently wanted to give Charleston a "fair deal." His article is finely illustrated, but under a photograph of the dry dock appears this: "The dock is not large enough for battleships and large cruisers but can take care of smaller craft." The fact is the dry dock can accommodate all battleships in the fleet now that are less than 545 feet long. This means any of the battleships we have or are building except the Arkansas, Nevada, New York, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Texas, Wyoming, Arizona, California, Mississippi, Idaho, 43, and 44. Strenuous efforts are now being made and will continue to be made until the channel from the city to the navy yard is dredged sufficiently to permit any ships in our fleet to go there.

Had the Navy Department itself been friendly or even willing to be just to Charleston, the Cooper River would have been dredged out long ago and the yard made accessible to the whole fleet. The fleet can get into the harbor and up to the city now. It has been there twice within the last five years. The navy yard is 6 miles up the Cooper River, and there are two mud banks in the way which will not allow any of the larger battleships to reach it. The Army engineers estimate that for an expenditure of $175,000 only to dredge this mud out of the channel the entire battleship fleet now built and to be built can steam into the harbor at low water and go right on up to the navy yard itself. The letter from Admiral Benson, Chief of Operations, which I will read, emphasizes very strongly the almost vital necessity of having a dock accessible south of Hatteras; and Charleston's dock is already there, and it is the only one. This is Admiral Benson's letter, written to me three days ago:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 10, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The only example that has so far occurred in the war now going on abroad which emphasizes the necessity of a dry dock in the vicinity of an action, by reason of serious injury to a vessel, is the case of the British battle cruiser Lion, which was injured in the Dogger Bank engagement between the British and the Germans in January, 1915. It is the general impression that had it been necessary to tow this vessel very much farther, it would have been impossible to save her.

This emphasizes the necessity of being able to reach a dry dock somewhere south of Hatteras, into which vessels could be towed and docked in the event of injury during an action in the waters to the southward of Cape Hatteras.

Sincerely, yours,

W. S. BENSON,
Chief of Naval Operations.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Even in the Navy Department itself there is a great ignorance concerning the Charleston yard, and about the harbor, too. This, notwithstanding one Naval Board stated that Charleston was better than Port Royal, and urged the removal of the navy yard from Port Royal to Charleston; and another board of naval officers selected the site and planned the yard—not as a naval station but as a navy yard—and laid it out on broad national lines. Many naval officers are still of the opinion—because they have read it so often in northern papers—that Charleston has no harbor worth while, and that the navy yard is not accessible because the channel to it needs to be dredged. The entrance to the dock fills up, I know, because of the quantity of silt held in suspension in the water of Cooper River. They pooh-pooh and sneer at it because of ignorance of the facts. The expense of keeping the entrance to the dock open is as nothing compared to what has been expended on League Island Navy Yard and many other yards we have, and it is outrageous to have these falsehoods given continued circulation and not to have the naval officers themselves familiar with the exact status in regard to Charleston and the navy yard there. Some members of the House Committee on Naval Affairs are equally ignorant and indifferent.

I ask permission to have inserted without reading, in large type, the article I send to the desk. The fine type tries my eyes, as I know it does the eyes of everyone else. I always pass over that sort of matter in the RECORD if I can. I send the article to the desk.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from South Carolina what he means by "large type"?

Mr. TILLMAN. I mean the same character of type in which the debates in the RECORD are printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. The ordinary RECORD type?

Mr. TILLMAN. The ordinary RECORD type.

Mr. GALLINGER. There will be no objection to that, of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

THE CHARLESTON NAVY YARD IN CONNECTION WITH "PREPAREDNESS."

[By R. G. Rhett, Charleston, S. C.]

[The reasons why the present navy yard at Charleston, S. C., should be developed and why the limited amount of money needed for dredging to make the yard available for the largest ships should be promptly expended are set forth in a striking manner by Mr. Rhett in the article herewith. He gives the reasons for the building of the Charleston Navy Yard and convincingly states the necessity the Government is under to care for it. This is an article which should be read by every Member of Congress, as well as by every intelligent voter who wants to acquaint himself with the facts regarding an important branch of national preparedness, namely, the coast defenses of the United States.

Mr. R. G. Rhett is president of the People's National Bank of Charleston and one of the foremost business men of that city. He has been mayor of Charleston, and both in office and as a private citizen he has been unceasingly and extraordinarily energetic in working for the welfare and development of Charleston and his section of the South.—Editor Manufacturers' Record.]

"In the plans for preparedness which have been laid before Congress there has been one singular omission to which I wish to call attention. Provision has been made for more dreadnaughts, more battle cruisers, more submarines, and other vessels of war, but little attention has been paid to the bases from which these vessels are to operate, and to which they are to retire for refuge or repair in time of stress. A dreadnaught costs over $15,000,000—a dry dock less than $2,000,000. The loss of a dreadnaught could readily occur for the want of a dry dock at a convenient point on our coast. Have we ever considered where our naval conflicts are likely to occur and where our repair shops are most likely to be needed?

"The Atlantic coast of the United States is about 2,500 miles in extent, and midway projects Hatteras, one of the most dangerous capes known to navigation. On the northern half of this coast there are six navy yards; on the southern half there is but one, and that one does not even contain a crane of sufficient capacity to handle a modern turret gun, a modern Scotch marine boiler, nor a turbine for a dreadnaught. In fact, there is not such a crane anywhere on our coasts south of Hatteras. And yet if we ever do have a naval engagement it will most assuredly take place in the Caribbean Sea.

"Instead of developing the only yard south of Hatteras on the Atlantic coast, constant pressure has been brought to bear to close it or to confine its equipment and its operations to small craft. And both of our Gulf yards were actually closed altogether by ex-Secretary Meyer. One would suppose that the Potomac River was the southern boundary of the United States, and that the South Atlantic and Gulf coasts were foreign shores.

"We have built an interoceanic canal at an enormous cost in order that we may be able to transfer our fleet from one coast to another as military exigencies may require, and yet we persist in keeping that fleet bound to bases located just as far away from this canal as possible. Moreover, we are from time to time being advised by ex-Secretary Meyer, through magazines and papers, that the salvation of the country depends upon abandoning all naval bases south of Hatteras and holding the fleet assembled on the North Atlantic coast. Surely this is sectionalism run mad.

"The first essential requisite for a naval base, Mr. Meyer states, is a harbor which can accommodate a fleet, and he finds none on the Atlantic except Hampton Roads and Narragansett Bay. He disposes of the harbor of Charleston as if it could accommodate no battleships at all.

"In 1905 the coast squadron, under command of Admiral Dickens, spent the winter in Charleston Harbor, and took occasion to make a survey of its capacity for a fleet of battleships of the deepest draft then designed. His statement is as follows:

"'After entering the harbor 50 battleships, with 26-foot draft, can be anchored in Charleston Harbor at single anchor, 400 yards apart, with a scope of 45 fathoms of chain. Sixty-five battleships with the same draft and with the same scope of chain can be moored in Charleston Harbor 1,000 feet apart. Thirty-five battleships can be moored above the battery.'

"There is no difference in its capacity for battleships of 30-foot draft. In fact, the entire fleet of the United States and all the dreadnaughts it contemplates in the next few years could find shelter in Charleston Harbor, and yet it is dismissed from any consideration, because above the harbor proper—between the city and the yard—there was two shoals of 28 feet at high water. These could and should have been removed long since, but neither Secretary Meyer nor any of his predecessors have ever recommended their removal. The War Department reports that a high-water channel of 35 feet throughout can be obtained for $175,000. The naval board, which located the yard above the city, evidently did not contemplate the possibility that subsequent administrations could neglect to open the approach to the dock. The approaches to the Portsmouth dock cost $750,000, and those to the Philadelphia dock cost $1,500,000. Why should the approaches to the Charleston dock and yard, which cost nearly $5,000,000, be neglected?

"Are we in earnest in our desire to prepare for defense? If so, must it not be a defense of the Nation, and not of a section of the Nation—of all our coast, and not of a favored fraction of it? What matters it to the inhabitant of the Mississippi or Ohio Valley whether his fields are invaded via the shores of New England or the Carolinas or Louisiana? What matters it to an enemy whether our northern coasts are impregnable to attack if he finds our southern coasts without any protection at all?

"Much newspaper abuse has been heaped upon Secretary Daniels because he ventured to reopen the Gulf yards in a limited way. The criticism should be because he has not insisted that one great naval base, thoroughly equipped to handle all war vessels planned or planning, should be immediately installed on the South Atlantic coast and another on the Gulf coast. To do less than this is to make of naval preparedness a mockery.

"Some years ago Guantanamo, near the southeastern end of Cuba, was suggested as the naval base for the southern section of the United States by the General Board. It was not taken seriously except as the excuse for Secretary Meyer's closing the yards at Pensacola and New Orleans. A board of inspection subsequently declared the Guantanamo suggestion impracticable for a number of reasons. Indeed, a base in a foreign country to be reached only by water is a little fantastic. A squadron may well be bottled up there as Cervera was bottled up in Santiago. Communications may be cut off and the yard become a possession and an asset of the enemy. Indeed, Congress has never been quite ready to place Charleston, Pensacola, and Guantanamo in the same class, as some of our Secretaries would have it do. A main base for our fleet should be capable of protection even against a superior naval force and in close and certain connection with the military centers of the country.

"An article in Everybody's Magazine on navy yards and Army posts has been called to my attention, which is typical of the kind of stuff with which the public is being misled. It appeared in the November issue, and is an indiscriminate abuse of yards and posts and of the Senators and Congressmen supposed to be responsible for them. That with reference to the Charleston yard may be taken as a sample, viz:

"'Senator BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN lived in South Carolina, and before him Senator M. C. Butler. They were typical representatives of the spirit that demands a division of our fighting money by locality rather than the need for defense. Butler got a navy yard at Port Royal, S. C., that cost, including dredging, nearly $3,000,000; then it has to be abandoned for real navy-yard purposes. Ships couldn't get to it. Then Senator TILLMAN got a navy yard located at Charleston in shallow water, involving heavy cost for poor service. Five million dollars have gone into this yard. Shallow water or deep makes no difference to the men who profit by the naval money.'

"Preceding the above is the following statement:

"'From the standpoint of the present European war, however, naval authorities believe that we need a shore establishment pretty well scattered along our coast line. The great length of the coast and the new methods of fighting with small vessels make it necessary to have stations for manufacturing and repairing such craft and for patrol bases.'

"And yet he condemns out of hand the only yards along 1,200 miles of Atlantic coast most exposed to attack. The Port Royal Yard was located a great many years ago by a board of the Navy Department, headed by Admiral Porter—not by Senator Butler—and it was located there because it was the only deep-water harbor along that coast at the time. Since then vessels have been built of a size and draft far beyond the dream of our Navy men of that day, and the Government has spent many millions in deepening the harbors of the country to keep pace with the increasing draft of merchant vessels. Senator TILLMAN found a yard at Port Royal in his State, upon which he could not get the Navy Department to expend any money, because it was said not to be capable of the development nor to have the protection demanded by modern warfare. At the suggestion of Admiral M. T. Endicott, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy Department, Senator TILLMAN inserted a clause in the pending bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a board of naval experts to examine the harbor of Charleston and its vicinity, for the purpose of determining whether it would be advisable to transfer the yard to that port, taking into consideration the expenditures already made at Port Royal. The yard was located at Charleston, first, because the Chief of Yards and Docks of the Navy Department thought it ought to be there; next, because, after a thorough investigation, a board of naval experts, headed by Admiral Frederick Rodgers, found it to be the proper place for it; and, finally, because Secretary John D. Long, of Boston, ordered it to be done.

"Moreover, it was located by this board of naval experts, with the approval of Admiral Endicott and of Secretary Long, upon the Cooper River, where it now stands, and Senator TILLMAN had no more to do with its location there than did the author of this article. It will be a matter of some surprise to a great many people that the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy Department conceived Charleston to be the proper place for a yard, and actually suggested it to Senator TILLMAN, but it is a fact, and Admiral Endicott told it to me himself with a great deal of satisfaction.

"The Charleston Navy Yard was located on Cooper River, about 5 miles above the city, for the reason that it was beyond the reach of bombardment and the sweep of storms, while it had close connection with all railroad systems, ample yard room, and several miles of deep water front. The channel above the city is in one or two spots only 22½ feet at low water, which gives 28 feet at high water, but the cost of making this channel 35 feet at high water all the way to the navy yard—600 feet wide in straight stretches and 1,000 feet at curves—was estimated by the Army engineers to be less than $175,000, and was recommended to be done over six years ago. It can be done at any time in less than a year.

"As to the importance of a base on the South Atlantic coast, and incidentally of that base being Charleston, every commandant who has been in charge of the yard there has expressed himself freely. I quote from published articles of the last two:

"Admiral Helm says: 'During the last 12 years since the establishment of the navy yard at Charleston was first determined, the enterprise has come in for a vast deal of misrepresentation, and Senator TILLMAN, who has been its steadfast champion, has been roundly abused because of it. Nevertheless, even under hostile administrations, it has grown and expanded. The fact is, as all naval men recognize, that with the opening of the Panama Canal the Charleston Navy Yard becomes an invaluable asset of the Navy. The prime purpose of the canal is to afford a quick means of transferring our battleships from our Atlantic to our Pacific coast. The incomparable superiority of the Charleston Navy Yard lies in the fact that not only is it the nearest yard of first-class equipment to the Panama Canal, but it is the only yard south of Norfolk which is impregnable against an attack by sea. Charleston, although under seige throughout two great wars, has never been captured from the water. Its defenses to-day guarantee it against such a fate in future and make the Charleston Navy Yard, sheltered from storms and protected against any hostile fleet, the great strategic base from which any possible naval warfare of the future is most likely to be conducted.'

"Admiral Edwards says: 'It behooves the thoughtful and progressive officers of the Navy to give immediate, extended, and careful consideration concerning the possibilities of development of the Charleston (S. C.) naval station. Whether viewed from a financial, industrial, or strategic standpoint, the progressive, if not the rapid, development of this naval station intimately concerns the efficiency and operation of the fleet.

"'For military and strategic reasons it appears of paramount importance that there be developed on the Atlantic coast at some point south of Cape Hatteras a naval station capable of docking and repairing our largest and most important battleships. The protection of the Isthmian Canal, a project that involved an expenditure of about $400,000,000, combined with the general existing belief upon the part of naval experts that if the fleet of the United States will ever be called upon to engage in battle, the contest will take place in the Caribbean, makes it a matter of importance to the efficiency of the fleet that there be developed on the mainland of the Atlantic coast, and independent of any projected outlying naval base, a first-class naval station.

"'The channel and harbor conditions of the Charleston Navy Yard, together with its industrial possibilities, appear to be measured by some of our naval experts from conditions existing about the period of the close of the Civil War. As evidence of the satisfactory existing character and extent of the channel conditions on the navy-yard water front, it is only necessary to state that the battleship Connecticut about two years ago, with packed bunkers and a full supply of ammunition and stores, made a complete turn in the channel in front of the navy yard and proceeded to sea without the aid of tugs.

"'The industrial and military possibilities of the Charleston (S. C.) Navy Yard should be specifically inquired into by the General Board, for it is quite certain that a personal inspection upon the part of the naval experts composing that board would place Charleston upon a plane that its importance deserves.

"'The fact that the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. contemplates having its steamers leaving Puget Sound stop at San Francisco, Charleston, and Philadelphia on their regular trips to New York probably best tells of the growing importance of Charleston as a leading maritime port.'

"If it be admitted that a great naval base and yard ought to be established on this shore—and there should not be any difference of opinion on the subject—Charleston is not only ideally located for it, but it is the only port which is capable of serving this purpose. Not only is it the deepest harbor along the coast, but it is the only harbor with a broad landlocked bay in which a great fleet can assemble and lie at anchor; where natural defenses and fortifications make it impregnable to attack; where rail connection with the arsenals and vital centers of the country are short and numerous.

"The city is only 7½ miles from the ocean, to begin with, and the channel, lying for some distance between jetties, is easily mined, and is protected by numerous batteries along Sullivans Island, as well as by modern 12-inch guns at Fort Sumter. It is located directly north of the Panama Canal, from which its sailing distance is only 12 per cent greater than the sailing distance from New Orleans. It is only 500 miles from Washington, with two railway systems making a direct connection and a third—the Southern—an indirect connection. It has two rail connections with the West and two with the South. It has the only coal terminals on the coast, and is the distributing point for the Carolinas of both the Standard and the Texas Oil Cos. Its channel is not only now the deepest and straightest along the coast, but it practically maintains itself. In fact, there has been no work done upon it for something like 20 months. Moreover, it is capable of further deepening at a very small cost. The harbors south of Hatteras are here given, showing their depth at low water—rise of tide from 5 to 6 feet; their distance from the ocean; the expenditures upon them in the past 10 years; the tonnage of vessels entering each of them in these 10 years; and the appropriations proposed for the present year:

	Expended on harbor.	Number of ships.	Tonnage.	Mean low-water depth.	Distance from ocean.
				Feet.	Miles
Charleston	$665,226	9,281	17,491,750	28	7½
Savannah	3,115,501	8,212	19,140,550	24.2	26
Wilmington	2,277,978	2,717	3,335,601	26	30
Jacksonville	3,486,227	14,680	14,505,916	22.5	28
Brunswick	758,906	4,086	5,520,123	22	14.5
Georgetown	854,917	6,368	8,211,446	18	.....

In bill for present year.

Charleston	$80,000
Savannah	397,500

"Five years ago the War Department recommended the deepening of the harbor to 30 feet at low water, at a cost of $350,000, but we have knocked at the door of Congress in vain for it. With the only navy yard and the only coaling station along this coast located in this harbor, there certainly should be no further delay in doing this inexpensive piece of harbor work, so that at all stages of the tide the largest of dreadnaughts may safely enter for docking and the largest of merchant ships may come in for coal. At a cost of less than one-half of the amount spent upon either of the ports of Wilmington, Savannah, or Jacksonville in the last 10 years we could have 35 feet at low water and 40 feet at high water, giving us a port unexcelled in this country from any standpoint.

"Writers and speakers have seized upon some statement showing that $5,000,000 has been expended upon the Charleston Yard, and that our larger battleships can not reach the dry dock, and have drawn the conclusion that the yard is useless; that the $5,000,000 has been thrown away; that the idea of establishing a naval base along this coast ought never to have been contemplated and ought now to be abandoned. It does not seem to occur to them that it may be wiser to spend $175,000 and save the $5,000,000 and, incidentally, the only naval base on this coast. It does not seem to occur to such writers that it might be well to look into the merits of the yard irrespective of how it has been established. It is fixed in their minds as a political plum of Senator TILLMAN'S, and it therefore stands condemned.

"As a matter of fact, it is not only a great strategic base, located by the Navy Department, but a most efficient industrial plant splendidly equipped, as far as it goes, and doing magnificent work. It has time and again underbid private yards, and has done the work for less than the bid. It should be thrown open to all our ships of war and be made a factory and repair shop for dreadnaughts and torpedo boats alike.

"Senator TILLMAN has been abused because he demanded for the South its slice of navy-yard 'pie'—to use their language and his. Let us see how large a slice this was in the last year of Secretary Meyer's administration:

Expenditures for 1912.

Portsmouth Yard		$2,106,541
Boston		4,047,111
New York		9,456,783
Philadelphia		3,257,223
Washington		7,201,538
Norfolk		4,533,805
Total North Atlantic coast		30,603,001
Charleston Yard	$720,792
Port Royal	95,720
Total South Atlantic coast (2 per cent)		816,512
Mare Island	4,586,974
Puget Sound	3,217,919
Total Pacific coast		7,804,893
Olongapo	920,736
Cavite	619,592
Total Philippine Islands		1,540,438
		40,764,734

"It may be interesting to note the progress in recent years. Expenditures at the Charleston yard in the last four years are as follows:

Total expenditures for labor and material.

"In conclusion, let me repeat that if the underlying thought in our preparation for defense is the removal of all temptation for attack upon us, then we must plan a defense of the Nation as a whole, and not of a section of the Nation; we must have naval bases of the first class on our southern coasts as well as on our northern coasts; we must have coast fortifications that are properly equipped and properly manned south of Hatteras as well as north of Hatteras; our troops must be brought from interior points, where they are serving no purpose, and made to familiarize themselves with the topography and strategic points of all our coasts. If we do less than this, our so-called preparedness will not ward off, but will invite attack. If our policy of preparedness is to include a consideration for the political integrity and independence of our fellow Republics of this hemisphere, then it is still more imperative that we do not delay in the preparation of a great naval base on the South Atlantic and a great naval base on the Gulf, where our shores lie nearest to them.

"One objection has been urged with great force and effect against southern yards which deserves consideration, and that is the difficulty of securing sufficient skilled labor at short notice from adjacent industries for the repair of large ships. Of course this should have little weight in the scale with strategic exigencies from a military standpoint, especially as labor can be brought from the centers of mechanical industry in less than 24 hours. But as a matter of industrial economy the proper way to keep such a force on hand for emergency repair on large ships is to utilize these yards for shipbuilding. The climate is suitable, material and coal may be obtained by the Government at exceedingly favorable rates, and these yards can become economical shipbuilding plants for all kinds of vessels needed by the Navy. The force steadily employed would thus be always at hand for emergencies.

"Can we not at this crisis view our problem of preparedness comprehensively and recognize the country south of the Potomac, as a part of the Nation which requires its protection and deserves its consideration in no less a degree than that lying behind the 1,200 miles of coast north of Hatteras?"

Mr. TILLMAN. That article goes fully into the facts about the Charleston Harbor and the Charleston Navy Yard, too; and I defy any man who has any care for his reputation for truth to disprove any assertion made by Mayor Rhett. It is a reprint from the Manufacturers' Record of January 13, 1916. Mr. Rhett shows conclusively the value of the Charleston Harbor as an asset to the United States Navy and how it has been discriminated against by the department itself in years past. Former Secretary of the Navy George von L. Meyer tried in every way possible to belittle and destroy the yard, and Congress, under the Republicans, cooperated with him most willingly—seemingly gladly.

One striking fact about Mr. Rhett's article is this: The expenditure for the six yards north of Hatteras in 1912 was $30,603,601; for the Charleston Yard, $720,792; and for Port Royal, $95,720; making $816,512 for those two—the only ones in the South. Port Royal is no longer maintained as a naval station. The Navy Department, under Secretary Daniels, has utilized the Government property and the durable buildings there as disciplinary barracks. If Mr. Meyer's policy had been continued, this valuable property, costing over a million dollars, would have gone to waste or been sold by him for a song like the floating dry dock at Pensacola.

With regard to that floating dry dock and what Secretary Meyer sold it for, I have just received a letter from the Secretary of the Navy giving full details officially from the records, which I ask to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, March 20, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR TILLMAN: In response to your request for information concerning the history of the floating dry dock which was formerly stationed at Pensacola, Fla., I give you the following from the records of the department:

An act of Congress, June 7, 1900, authorized the purchase of this dry dock from the Government of Spain for a sum not to exceed $275,000. The dock was inspected by a board of officers in January, 1901, and in July, 1901, the purchase was effected, and title acquired in September, at a cost of $195,000, the dock being delivered to this Government at Habana, Cuba. It was at this time in need of extensive repairs. Certain necessary repairs were made at Habana to fit the dock for transfer to the United States, and in November, 1902, it was towed to the navy yard, Pensacola. Further repairs were made thereafter to fit the dock for service. The total expenditures were as follows:

Towage	35,000.00
Repairs	69,977.65
Turned into Treasury	22.35
	300,000.00

The Pensacola Navy Yard was closed, by order of Secretary Meyer, on October 20, 1911, and in February, 1912, the dry dock was advertised for sale. On March 11, 1912, bids were opened, as follows:

W. M. Evans, Mobile, Ala	$31,600
Ollinger-Bruck Dry Dock Co	31,000
James Shewan & Sons, New York	28,050
J. G. Hitner, Philadelphia, Pa	27,501
Boston Iron & Metal Co	26,100
New Orleans Dry Dock Co., New Orleans	25,100
Oliver Bros. Purchasing Co., New York	7,110
Saul Butter, Roxbury, Mass	5,100
Gulf Machine Works, Pensacola, Fla	5,000
Gregory Wrecking & Constructing Co., Perth Amboy	2,000

The dock was accordingly sold to W. M. Evans for $31,600. James Shewan & Sons, New York, purchased the dock from W. M. Evans at a figure reported to be between $40,000 and $50,000.

A month or six weeks ago I requested the commandant of the New York Navy Yard to ascertain the present condition of the dock, and was informed that its owners, James Shewan & Sons, reported it to be in almost daily operation. It would appear, therefore, that at the time of its sale the dock was competent to render valuable service, at least for many more years.

Sincerely, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the two Pacific coast yards, Mare Island and Puget Sound, got $7,804,893; the Philippines got $1,540,438. This makes a total of $40,765,444 for the United States naval stations altogether, and only $816,512 of that to be spent in the South. To me this smacks very loudly of sectionalism and favoritism—one or both.

Uncle Sam seemed, under Republicans, always to have money to take care of the Navy everywhere except south of Hatteras; yet the stretch of coast from Hatteras to Key West and from Key West to the mouth of the Rio Grande is more than 2,000 miles and has three or four good harbors. This whole subject of the neglect of the south Atlantic and Gulf coast by the Navy Department has been ably and fully treated in an article by Admiral John R. Edwards, which I had printed as a public document. Admiral Edwards is an accomplished engineer and his breadth of view and patriotic impulses led him to defend and champion the Charleston Harbor and the Charleston Navy Yard, as well as the Pensacola Navy Yard, along with other yards, because he feels that they are of vital importance to the healthy and permanent development of the United States Navy. He believes any scheme of preparedness which does not take these two yards into consideration is woefully lacking in breadth of view and farsightedness.

I feel that to neglect to equip these two yards as they should be under conditions as they now exist would be a crime and almost a calamity. It will naturally be believed and charged I am interested in Charleston only because it is in South Carolina. That statement has been made so often and so repeatedly I have gotten used to it; but I thank God I can look north of Mason and Dixon's line as well as south of it; and I am endeavoring, as chairman of the Naval Committee, as was proved by my works, to have the New York Navy Yard made accessible. I want to build an armor plant at Philadelphia, on League Island, because I believe it is the best place, and I shall vote for the new dock proposed for Norfolk. I am endeavoring now to have the navy yard at Bremerton fully equipped for building battleships, and I voted for and urged the equipment of Mare Island to build battleships. In the name of God, are men so narrow and selfish and so sectional that they can not forget the past and still want to cherish hatred of the South, and South Carolina in particular? Do we pay no taxes? I ask this question because I feel very strongly on this particular subject; but I do not believe very many, or any, Senators now entertain any such feeling.

The prevalent opinion about Charleston shows how hard it is for the truth to overtake a lie, and this lie seems to have more lives than a cat, because it has been proved a lie often enough to be regarded as one, at least, in the Navy Department.

I remember some years ago—in 1902 and 1903—I joined with Senator Hale and other members of the Naval Committee to have the rock at Hendersons Point, where the entrance to the Portsmouth Navy Yard is, blown out of the way, at a cost of $749,000. I want the Senator from New Hampshire to take notice of this.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire introduced the amendment which resulted in the removal of that obstruction.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know that, and I joined with former Senator Hale in having it done. All three of us—Hale, GALLINGER, and I—were considering the good of the American Navy and not working for our respective States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly that is true, and I feel sure that former Senator Hale and the Senator from South Carolina joined the Senator from New Hampshire in working on that line.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know the Senator from New Hampshire is broad and liberal, that he is not at all sectional.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true. The Senator from South Carolina has got that just right.

Mr. TILLMAN. Former Senator Hale was liberal enough and broad-minded enough to be willing to have a navy yard at Charleston and voted appropriations sufficient to develop it. Alas! old age has come on him, too, like it has on me, and he is no longer in the Senate. Republican though he was, and partisan in that respect, he could see, and did see, south of the Potomac River, while some men in and out of Congress have never been able to see farther in that direction, because South Carolina seceded in 1860. I am resolved to put the facts before the Senate and the country whether any of the Senators read them or not. Therefore I have asked to have printed in the RECORD the article to which I have referred, which Senators can read in the RECORD if they want to do so and if they desire to find out the truth. The truth about Charleston shall get into the RECORD, where it will permanently record the facts about the Charleston Harbor and the Charleston Navy Yard. If men will be little-minded, narrow, and sectional I can not help it. I thank the good Lord I am not built that way.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, seemed to base his chief argument against this bill on the ground that it was going to destroy the private armor factories. I do not believe that any member of the committee who voted to report this bill favorably would have done so if he had believed that it would have resulted in the destruction of the armor plants under the conditions the Senator from Massachusetts has stated. While we desire to reduce the cost of armor, I think the chief object of this bill is to furnish a reserve capacity, which may be used by this Government in the event of emergency.

Our present naval program calls for 24,000 tons of armor plate a year. The total capacity of the private factories in the United States to-day is only 30,000 tons. The testimony shows that a battleship requires about 8,500 tons. If that be true—and that was what the Mississippi required, and I believe that the other battleships are going to be larger—there will not be a sufficient armor capacity to supply an additional battleship. The question was asked Mr. Dinkey, when he was on the witness stand before the committee, If the naval program were doubled could the private institutions take care of the armor requirements, and he said, "No; not without enlarging their plants." I believe that the object of the Senate is to treat the armor plants just as we are treating the private shipyards—that is, to give them sufficient business to encourage them and keep them alive, so that we may have in this country a reserve capacity, and so that if there comes a great demand for a number of battleships we may be able to build them.

I was surprised that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts should not consider a bill of this kind as a part of the preparedness program. He chided Congress; he chided the members of the committee on not taking up the naval bill. He said that what we should be considering is the building of battleships and not the destruction of private enterprise. Armor plate is absolutely essential to the building of battleships; you can no more increase the number of battleships without increasing the provisions for the manufacture of armor plate than you can increase the number of ships without shipyards. What we are faced with now is a lack of reserve capacity for armor plate—an absolute essential, as I have said, for battleships.

During the testimony, when Mr. Dinkey was attempting to excuse himself for not giving us publicly the facts with regard to the cost of production of armor plate, he said, "We can not make it public, because we do not want our competitors to know the cost." When he was asked who were his competitors and if there was any competition in the United States between these three manufacturing institutions, he said, "We do not want our competitors abroad to know the cost of this material," and yet no concern abroad can sell armor to us. There is no one who can supply our armor necessities except these three institutions. No one of them can supply it all. Even if one of them bids on all of the armor needed, it would have to divide it up amongst the other two. It is a natural monopoly. When Mr. Dinkey was answering questions along that line we asked him if he had any other market besides the United States, and he said yes; they did have some foreign business and they were expecting more. I asked him the question if Brazil and Argentina and Chile should see a necessity for preparedness as we see a necessity for preparedness, and they should place an order with the factories in this country equal to the amount contracted for by this Government, what would be done. He answered, "Of course we would recognize the Government first." What I am getting at is this: The testimony shows that there is going to be an increased demand for armor plate from other countries; in fact, every sign of the times would indicate to thinking men that all countries are going to find it necessary to move along the line of preparedness in proportion to each other. Would it not be to the interest of this Government, if these private institutions can get sufficient business from foreign countries to keep them in existence, at the same time itself to provide 20,000 tons capacity in addition? That is the idea I have, and that is what I want.

Suppose, for instance, that this Government should build a 20,000-ton plant and should run it half capacity. There would then be 12,000 tons left for the private plants. That would be as much as the private plants have had on the average since their existence. Mr. Grace testified that these plants had only been run at one-third capacity since their very existence. What has been the result? Orders requiring them to run at only one-third capacity have been sufficient to keep them in business. They are satisfied to continue in business if they get orders to fill that one-third capacity. Now, if we build a 20,000-ton plant and run it at half capacity and give contracts for the other half of the armor required under the proposed naval building program to the private institutions, they will then be receiving a greater patronage than they have received during any period of their history up to the present time.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. LIPPITT. May I ask the Senator why he wants the Government to erect a 20,000-ton plant and run it on half time? Why not build a 10,000-ton plant, thereby saving half the money, and run it on full time?

Mr. PITTMAN. Because there may come a necessity for this Government to utilize 50,000 tons of armor plate a year. A battleship may be sent out to sea and destroyed in a second, and $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 is gone. In my opinion, if we built a plant of 20,000-ton capacity and were compelled to let it lie idle as a reserve to the armor-plate factories we have now, it would be a great insurance for this country.

Mr. LIPPITT. It would be what?

Mr. PITTMAN. A great insurance and a cheap insurance for this country. I think that if we should pay the interest upon $11,000,000, even if we allowed the plant to lie idle so as to keep the other plants going, it would be a cheap insurance, as it would make certain our ability to construct three or four additional battleships in case we require them.

Mr. LIPPITT. But, Mr. President, we have all the capacity we have ever needed, and more, too.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; we have all the capacity we have ever needed; but I do not think for one moment that the Senator will venture to say how long that capacity will be sufficient in the present condition of the world. England had all the capacity which she needed for 40 years; France had all the capacity she needed for 40 years; but that capacity was not sufficient when it came to the present European war.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say that I do not think we would long have sufficient armor-making capacity if the Government built its own plant. I believe if the Government builds its own plant it will reduce the capacity of this country for making armor by 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is the statement the Senator makes, and yet Mr. Grace, the president of the Bethlehem Steel Co., said in his testimony that he would continue to run on as they have been running on.

Mr. LIPPITT. Where does Mr. Grace say that?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will get it for the Senator.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, Mr. Grace was referring to conditions under which his plant is operating at the present time, when he has a large contract. He did not say that he would be satisfied to run as they have been running for the last 10 years, but just at present they have a large contract, as I understand. I do not think Mr. Grace ever made that statement, or if he did, that he ever contemplated it would be subject to the interpretation the Senator is putting on it.

Mr. PITTMAN. It may not be subject to that interpretation. However, I will call it to the attention of the Senator that the Senate may interpret it. The Bethlehem Co. has been manufacturing armor since 1887.

Mr. Grace testified as follows:

> With contracts of 3,280 tons, this would provide only $128,280.80 a year, or less than 1¾ per cent on the investment, without any consideration whatever for repayment of capital invested in the plant.

And yet since 1887 the Bethlehem Steel Co. armor plant has only received orders sufficient to run it practically at one-third capacity. The capacity of the Bethlehem Steel Co. is 12,000 tons.

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes; but it was not 12,000 tons in 1887.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; its capacity has been increased.

Mr. LIPPITT. It was increased about 1903 or 1904, I think——

Mr. PITTMAN. It was increased in 1902, I think. Up to that time its capacity was about 7,500 or 8,000 tons. Then the capacity of the plant was increased, and its capacity now, according to the testimony, is about 12,000 tons. Since 1902 up to the present time the average orders of that concern have been sufficient only to run it one-third capacity, but they have never shown any indication of a desire to go out of the business. Every time that the Government has attempted to provide a reserve capacity on its own behalf for building armor plate they have opposed it. They have opposed it for the same business reasons that the Senator from Rhode Island opposes it to-day. They have opposed it on the ground that private institutions were entitled to make a profit out of the manufacture of armor; but what I am getting at is that from 1902 to the present time they have run on one-third capacity.

Mr. LIPPITT. As I recall, Mr. Grace testified that if they had invested their money in 4 per cent bonds they would have been a great deal better off than they were after investing in an armor-plate factory.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is what he testified to.

Mr. LIPPITT. Under oath?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and yet every time this Government has attempted to go into the business itself they have opposed it.

Mr. LIPPITT. Because the plant is there, and they could do nothing else with it.

Mr. PITTMAN. What I am getting at is this: If we should supply them with one-third of their capacity from now on, would they go out of business?

Mr. LIPPITT. I think they would.

Mr. PITTMAN. Why did they not go out of business from 1902 to the present time, then?

Mr. LIPPITT. Well, you know "hope springs eternal in the human breast," and I think they have felt all the time that some time or other they might do better; they might get more business; and they could not do anything else with their plant. But if the Government establishes the policy that instead of their having one-third of their plant running part of it will be reduced, I think the natural tendency will be for them to go out of business. I do not know what they would do, but I should think that would be the probable result.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator thinks, does he, that the probable result would be that they would go out of business when since 1902 they have kept in business on one-third of their capacity?

Mr. LIPPITT. But they did not have a Government plant to take their business away. They got all the business there was.

Mr. PITTMAN. Would it make any difference whether the Government plant was in existence or not, if they got the same amount of business upon which they have existed for 30 years?

Mr. LIPPITT. They would not get it.

Mr. PITTMAN. But the proposition is, if the Government gives them one-third of the orders, will it not keep them alive? I contend that it will keep them alive, because it has kept them alive in the past.

Mr. LIPPITT. But, Mr. President, if the Government gives to each of these three factories one-third of its business, what business is the Government plant going to do?

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator asked me the question whether, in case the Government gives to the Bethlehem plant one-third of its business, the Bethlehem plant will be kept alive. I ask the Senator if the Government gives to each of these three manufacturers one-third of the business that is going, which amounts to the total, what will the Government plant do? Is that on the basis that he thinks it would be a good project to take fifteen or twenty million dollars of the people's money and put in a plant and then have it lie idle, and sell excursion tickets to go to it as a spectacle of the National Government's business acumen? I suppose they might make a little money in that way, but they would not make it in any other way.

Mr. PITTMAN. In questions of this kind I am not so used to dealing with money as is the Senator from Rhode Island. I am looking now at the question of preparedness. This is a question of patriotism. I can very readily see that a government could well invest $11,000,000 in insurance for the capacity to build battleships to defend its shores. I want to say to the Senator that the policy of this Government now with regard to the building of battleships contradicts the assertion of the Senator that there is any intention on the part of this Government of crushing and running out of business these armor plants. Has the Government shown any policy to drive out of business the private shipbuilding plants? Was it not testified in the hearings that the policy——

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Just a moment. Was it not testified in the hearings that it was the policy of the Government so to divide and scatter the ships between private yards and Government navy yards as to keep the private yards alive?

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if he is not aware that the shipbuilding industry of this country has a line of customers outside of the United States Navy, while the armor plants can sell only to the United States Government?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is true; and yet have they not urged upon the Government to give them some of the business to help keep them alive?

Mr. HARDING. Well, it is perfectly natural, from their standpoint.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is true; it is perfectly natural; and has not the Government shown its policy by giving them some of that business, although they had outside business?

Mr. HARDING. That is true; but——

Mr. PITTMAN. Now, then, if the Government has shown that policy toward sustaining the private shipyards in this country, which really do not need help as much as these armor plants, why should the Senator say it has changed its policy with regard to these armor-plant factories?

Mr. HARDING. The Senator fails to make this distinction: A privately owned shipbuilding yard has a wide range of trade other than that of the United States Government, while the manufacturer of armor plate has no customer in the United States except the Government itself.

Mr. PITTMAN. But is it not a fact that, in spite of their wide field, they do come to the Secretary of the Navy and say to him, "You should divide these shipbuilding contracts with us under the theory that you should help keep us alive in case of emergency"? Is not that true?

Mr. HARDING. That is quite likely.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is true; but what has been the policy of the Government? The policy of the Government has been to divide the contracts between the Government yards and the private shipyards, for the very purpose of helping sustain these institutions; and there is no doubt that the same policy would exist with regard to these armor-plate factories. When we build a Government shipyard we do not build it for the purpose of driving out of business the private institutions. We build it for the purpose of having an increased capacity, of having a reserve force, and that is what we want with this armor plant. We want a reserve force back of it.

If there is a demand to double our program to-morrow, what position are we in? The present program calls for 24,000 tons of armor plate per annum, and yet we only have a capacity in this country of 30,000 tons. There is only a surplus to-day of 6,000 tons over the present program—not enough to build a battleship like the Mississippi. Our program is modest in the extreme. Everyone knows that. All of us know that conditions are rapidly changing, which indicate to our minds that perhaps there will be a demand for a larger naval program at least. If that demand comes; if, as has been stated by some of the greatest naval experts we have, as has been stated by some of the best statesmen in this country, we need a Navy equal to any in the world, where will we get the armor plate to protect these ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on that point, if the Senator will permit me, the Senator does not believe that we are going to try to build the greatest navy in the world; and what information has the Senator that we are going to increase the number of our battleships this year over last year? If we have a surplus of 6,000 tons as the manufacturing establishments are to-day, private enterprise will enlarge those plants if it is necessary to make more armor plate.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is the exact question, Senator. It is a question whether we shall have our reserve capacity in the Government or in individuals. I think we should have the reserve capacity in the Government, for several reasons. One of the reasons, as stated by the Secretary of the Navy, is that we should give our naval experts, our ordnance men, an opportunity to study the manufacture of armor. The Senator from Rhode Island would have us believe that it is very difficult to find in the Navy experts who could conduct this work, and yet he forgets that harveyized steel was discovered in the navy yard at Washington. He forgets that 9 or 10 of our ordnance men have been taken right straight from the Navy and carried into the Bethlehem shops. He forgets that it has not been questioned by anybody that our naval ordnance men are equal to any. In fact, they are superior.

Now, the Secretary of the Navy has said that we ought to have a Government plant so that our naval experts may conduct their investigations and their studies, and attempt to improve the quality of our armor plate to meet the competition of the world in that line; further, that we should have a place where we could study the perfection of armor plate, and when we discover a process superior to another that we could at least keep that secret a part of the time. He testified in this matter that the Government was cooperating with private institutions in the manufacture of torpedoes, and discovered a process for making torpedoes superior to those made in foreign countries, and that the private institution attempted to sell some of those torpedoes to foreign countries so that they might study that new process and the secret of it; and it became necessary to go into the courts of the United States to enjoin that private institution from giving away the secrets of the manufacture of these torpedoes.

Those are things that must be considered in a matter of this kind. They seem very germane to a consideration of the question of preparedness.

There is another thing: Private institutions are not going to enlarge their present plants unless there is a guaranty and a contract to take up their increased capacity. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that we have not any information or any facts upon which we would be justified in entering into a contract for increased capacity, and therefore we can not expect these private institutions to do it. But while we may not have any facts or information, yet the precaution that is necessary to be exercised by the Government may warrant us in preparing for something that may never happen, but we will be prepared for it in case it does happen.

It is said that we have no information to lead us to believe that there will be an increase. I admit that; yet if this country should become involved in war to-morrow, there would be a demand for a larger Navy, and in these perilous times none of us can take the responsibility of saying that our Nation is entirely free from all danger of being involved in a war. Our whole scheme of preparedness, the increase of our Army, the increase of our Navy, is not dependent upon any conditions of war now. It is not dependent upon any threats of war now. It is dependent upon a world condition—a world condition that has suddenly come upon us that causes us to prepare for any eventuality. For that reason we must have a reserve capacity.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, of course the Senator joins with me in the hope that war may not overtake us, and neither the Senator nor I believes that it will; but if it should, has the Senator observed that during the almost two years of frightful war in Europe no battleship has participated in any contest—not one?

Mr. PITTMAN. And I have observed during all that time that England, while supposedly being defeated, has been the most prosperous country in Europe. I have seen England's commerce practically undisturbed, and I have not heard of a foreign foe setting his foot upon England's soil, by reason of the dominant power of the British Navy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very true.

Mr. PITTMAN. I was asked a while ago by the distinguished Senator whether I hoped ever to see the Navy of this country equal to any in the world. I do; and I trust that does not constitute me a militarist. I care very little for the enlargement of the Army. I can conceive of no American expeditionary force of which I would want to be a supporter. I would not want to send a soldier outside of this country if I could help it; but I would like a Navy that would keep any foe off our soil and at the same time protect our commerce on every sea in the world, just the same as Great Britain is protected to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am rather surprised at the suggestion of the Senator that he expects to see our Navy the greatest in the world. If England should stop building ships of war at the present time, it would take us about 10 years to catch up to her; and what is England going to be doing while we are building battleships and other ships of war? I think it is absolutely a dream that we are ever going to have the greatest Navy in the world.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will say to the Senator that this Nation will be in existence 10 years from now, and very probably thousands of years from now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Great Britain has not the potentialities of wealth and power that this country has. It has not the constituency of its people, it has not the isolation, that this country has. I believe, with the commerce this country is destined to have, with a wealth greater than that of any country in the world, that the natural tendency of things is that this country shall eventually be able to match any navy in the world in the protection of that commerce upon the high seas and protecting its shores against invasion. I do not know when it will come.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, that may be so, but it is a dream.

Mr. PITTMAN. It may be a dream, but I can not see why we can not have a pleasant dream. I can not see why we have got to be constantly at the mercy of any foreign navy. I hope the time will come, and I believe it will, when the Navy of this country will be the great peace-deciding factor of the world.

I will digress just a few minutes on that line, if the Senate will pardon me. I can not to save my life see how at the present time there can possibly be any settlement of great international disputes through a court of arbitration. I firmly believed in it prior to the beginning of this war. I should like to believe in it now, but when I see a terrific war, like the present one, for causes that seem trivial to me; when I see a war like that with no apparent effort on the part of the warring factions to settle the dispute peaceably; when I see them fail to go to The Hague or to appeal to the neutral nations, I can not have much hope. I have always believed that the fights of nations could be settled, like the disputes of individuals, by a court, and it can be done among people of the same race, but where you have racial hatred, where you have racial suspicion, where you have men chafing under ancient wrongs, when they have no confidence in the word or the honor of another race, then there is nothing upon which to found a court. No court can have any existence through any authority unless the people that create it and who will be bound by its rules have confidence in the integrity of that court.

I believe now that the thing that kept Europe out of war for 40 years and that will some day practically eternally keep it out of war is the influence and the power of this Government. War did not happen in Europe for 40 years, not because they did not dislike each other, not because they did not have the same grievances during those 40 years that they had the day the war commenced, but because they did not know where lay the balance of power. When they believed that the balance of power had shifted from one side to another they went at each other's throats. But if this country of ours had had a navy of sufficient magnitude to have been a world power, and it had intimated to every one of those threatening, warring factions that this country could not avoid the effect of a great European war, and that it could not sit idly by and see that war commence without being considered in it; if it had made representations of that character and had had the power to back them up there would have been at least a pause. Neither one of those great warring factions, in my opinion, would have thought for a moment of entering into that contest with the fear that the balance of power might be thrown against it, whether it be physically or morally.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am afraid if our country had had the power and had taken that attitude we would have been engaged in some entangling alliance with foreign powers, contrary to George Washington's admonition. Does the Senator really think that, under any conditions, this great neutral Nation could have interfered in that conflict in Europe?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think this Nation would have had to interfere, and I would not have advised this Nation to interfere. I have not taken that position at all. I take the opposite position—that we have no right to interfere. I have always held that we had no right to interfere by reason of the invasion of Belgium, as was urged by one of the distinguished statesmen of this country. I still contend it. What I believe is that the moral force of a great, powerful nation will be felt in the future, and that it is probably being felt now; and that is the force I wish to exert. How difficult it is even to exert a moral force, how difficult it is to make a demand for your rights, to protest against wrong, if you have not the power to stand on those rights and defend them!

This question of an armor-plate factory, in my opinion, is a part of the naval preparedness scheme. I felt at the time that it should have come in with the naval bill. It is just as important as it is to build up shipyards in this country.

We are now appropriating millions of dollars, for what purpose? For the purpose of building up shipyards in this country; for the purpose of placing them in a position where they can build battleships. Why? Why, it is for the future. It is looking to the future. It is looking to the growth of this country. It is looking to a change of conditions; and yet, when we say that we will create a reserve capacity of a 20,000-ton plant for armor, we are met with the argument that we are attempting to destroy individual business!

Is there any distinction between building this armor plant by the Government and building ships in Government shipyards? Is there any distinction between building this Government armor plant and building powder factories? Why, this is not Government ownership. The Government is not invading some other business. The Government is simply taking care of its own business.

Is any man expected to hire a carpenter to build his house if he is capable of building it himself? If the Government were invading some business not essentially governmental, you might raise the objection of interfering with private enterprise. As far as interfering with private enterprise is concerned, if it were not necessary to maintain the present private enterprise as a reserve capacity I would not consider it for a moment; but I contend that it is the policy of this Government to preserve, rather than to destroy, those factories. I think that if you should take a poll of the Senate to-day, or of the whole Congress, you would find that 90 per cent of the Members would say to you: "No; we have no intention of destroying those private plants. We want them in existence, so that we can use them when we need them." I think the action of this Government with regard to the shipbuilding plants is evidence of that.

I want to say that I would rather see this plant built and lie idle than not to have it at all. As I said before, I can not conceive of a worse position for this country to be in than if it became necessary to double our building program and have nowhere to get the armor plate for our vessels. We could not expect to get it abroad—not under the present existing condition of things abroad—and yet we will only have to increase our program a very little to get beyond the capacity of our private institutions, and those private institutions will not create a reserve unused capacity. We can not blame them for not doing it; but if we wanted to, we could build a 20,000-ton plant, and we could divide the business, and then those plants could be getting just as much as they have gotten since they were brought into existence. They did not stop in the past, and if they get that amount of work they will not stop in the future. Why? Because, as the Senator from Rhode Island says, "Hope springs eternal"; and, as was testified by Mr. Dinkey, they are seeking foreign business. They have already built one vessel for Argentina. They have some orders there. They have orders now.

If we supply them with the one-third of their capacity, which has been keeping them running for years, and they develop business in South America or develop business in Italy or somewhere else, and through private orders keep those great factories running, and we can run our Government factory as well, then, in case of emergency, instead of having only 30,000 tons capacity we will have 50,000 tons capacity; and I do not believe there is anyone here but that believes this country should have 50,000 tons capacity for the Navy at the present time.

Those are the questions. Now, then, as to the question of cost: I think this question of cost is so insignificant by comparison with the question of preparedness that I am not going to give much time to it. I think the great question is that which I have attempted to discuss. Those are the considerations that appeal to me. I want to say, however, that the record shows that the Government experts and the experts for the private factories have agreed that $262 per ton is approximately a correct manufacturing cost for armor plate, and to that the private institutions add other characters of costs. They add costs for administrative and general expenses amounting to $10 a ton. They add taxes and insurance amounting to $4.50 a ton. They add interest at 5 per cent on $7,100,000, in the case of the Bethlehem plant, amounting to $35 a ton. They add interest at 5 per cent on $500,000 working capital, amounting to $2.50 a ton. They make a total cost of $315 a ton working full capacity. They make a total cost of $499.89 working one-third capacity.

What does that mean? The manufacturing cost is definitely agreed on. That is $262.79. The only dispute is as to the costs involved in interest, taxes, insurance, and what they term general and administrative expenses.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to ask the Senator if he has ever had any experience in operating a manufacturing plant of any kind?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I can not say that I have. I should like to know whether the Senator from Pennsylvania has ever had any experience in operating an armor plant?

Mr. OLIVER. I have had no experience in operating an armor plant, but I have——

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, we were led by the evidence to believe that there was a great distinction between armor plants and other factories.

Mr. OLIVER. There is, of course, a great difference between operating an armor plant and another plant; but this principle applies to all plants: That the difference in manufacturing cost—not simply the general cost, but the manufacturing cost alone—between the operation of any plant of any kind, running full and running two-thirds full or one-third full, is so enormous that really, when the figures are placed before a person not familiar with such operations, the difference is staggering. I know, because I have had experience both ways and in both cases. I refer to the manufacturing cost alone.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand when a manufacturer engaged in one business has to close down one-half of the time or two-thirds of the time there is a fixed charge or expense added. But here is an enterprise which is only 3 per cent of the entire manufacturing business. This armor plant is only 3 per cent of the Bethlehem steel plant. Consequently, if you shut down two-thirds of the time 3 per cent of the business and the rest is running on continually, it makes a difference.

Mr. OLIVER. But it makes the same difference in the manufacturing cost of that 3 per cent.

Mr. PITTMAN. Now, to show you why we can not accept those figures as to running one-third capacity, the Bethlehem Steel Co. state that, running one-third capacity, they should have received $499.89 to make the interest on the investment, and yet they got only $425 for the product. Are we as reasonable men to accept such statement?

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator will again allow me to interrupt him, I will say that while I am not responsible for those figures the gentlemen who submitted those figures are reputable gentlemen, and they were under oath, notwithstanding the fact that the chairman of the committee told one of them he did not believe what he was saying. I will say that I know one of the gentlemen, and I would believe anything he would say at any time under any circumstances.

Mr. PITTMAN. The only person I have heard refer to the question of honesty of any of the witnesses has been on the other side. I certainly did not question the honesty or integrity of any one of the witnesses.

Mr. OLIVER. I am referring to what the chairman of the committee said to Mr. Dinky when Mr. Dinky was on the stand.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is a lawyer and understands there is a difference between the testimony of a witness as to a conclusion and his testimony as to facts which constitute a conclusion or from which to arrive at a conclusion. They testified that in their opinion the estimate they gave for general expenses was fair. I am not questioning but that they believed it, but how can we tell whether the estimates for general expenses were fair, when those general expenses included the salaries of president, vice president, treasurer, and secretary, and we do not know what those salaries are?

Mr. OLIVER. All you have is the word under oath of these gentlemen.

Mr. PITTMAN. We have their word.

Mr. OLIVER. I will say that I believe it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; we have the word of those gentlemen that in their opinion these things are reasonable, but we have no way of determining whether their prices are right or wrong.

I ask leave to place in the RECORD Exhibit C of the hearings. I will not take time to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXHIBIT C.

COST OF PRODUCING ARMOR PLATE UNDER VARIOUS CONDITIONS.

The production cost of armor with shop operating at full capacity has been determined as follows:

Report of Niles Board, House Document No. 193, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, $244.27 per ton:

Report of Tillman Board, House Document No. 1620, Sixty-third Congress, third session, $262.79 per ton.

(The later report reflects advances in cost of labor and material and is quite consistent with the earlier report, considering the differences in the dates at which they were made.)

Plant operating at half capacity, cost would be increased 20 per cent.

Plant operating at one-third capacity, cost would be increased 30 per cent.

These reports give mere shop cost and do not contain many items that enter into the actual total cost, such as administrative and general expense, insurance and taxes, interest on plant investment and working capital, etc., and in the following tabulation is shown the effect of the addition of some of these very real and important items. The depreciation of the plant, although a real addition to cost, is not included below, as it is shown that prices actually received by the manufacturers have not been sufficient to allow anything for this purpose.

	Cost per ton with plant provided with sufficient contract tonnage to operate at full capacity (10,000 tons). (This is a condition that has never been maintained.)	Cost per ton with plant provided with only sufficient tonnage to operate at one-third capacity. (This approximately represents actual average conditions that have obtained.)	Cost per ton with plant provided with sufficient tonnage to operate at two-thirds capacity. (This condition might obtain as a result of the proposed 5-year program.)
Production cost, plant operating at full capacity (Tillman report)	$262.79	$262.79	$262.79
Add for plant operating one-third capacity 30 per cent (Niles report)	.....	79.60	.....
Add for plant operating two-thirds capacity, 10 per cent (taken proportionately from Niles report figures)	.....	.....	26.28
Total production cost	262.79	342.39	289.07
Administrative and general expense ($100,000 per year)	10.00	30.00	15.00
Taxes and insurance ($45,000 per year)	4.50	13.50	6.75
Interest at only 5 per cent on $7,100,000 plant ($355,000 per year)	35.50	106.50	53.25
Interest at only 5 per cent on $500,000 working capital ($25,000 per year)	2.50	7.50	3.75

If the contracts awarded in the future should be in the same average quantities as in the past—namely, 3,280 tons per year, or about one-third our plant capacity—the present price of $425 per ton would provide as follows:

		Per ton.
Contract price		$425.00
Less—
Production cost (column No. 3)	$342.39
Administrative and general (column No. 3)	30.00
Taxes and insurance (column No. 3)	13.50
Leaving for interest on investment		39.11

With contracts for 3,280 tons, this would provide only $128,280.80 per year, or less than 1¼ per cent on the investment without any provision whatever for repayment of the capital invested in the plant when it may have to be abandoned, owing to the building of a Government plant or some radical change in the method of manufacture.

Mr. PITTMAN. Now, we come down to the question of costs to them. It is agreed that the manufacturing cost was $262.79 a ton. The only thing for the Government to determine is the overhead cost. We can not find out what the administrative cost of those works are, but we do know what the cost of the administrative work of the Government will be. We know that we have three experts to-day who are constantly in those three plants watching the manufacture of that armor plate. Those three men might just as well be in a Government armor-plate factory, or at least some of them. We have two other experts who are constantly testing this steel to see whether it is up to the specifications. They might just as well be testing that in a Government plant.

Senators speak about the secrets of this industry. The composition of Krupp steel is known to everyone. It is true that the physical process of melting it and heating it and transferring it requires skill, and yet the men who have that skill are not receiving over $5,000 or $6,000 a year.

When you come down to it, it is simply this: We have Army officers who are experts in this line. They are being paid by the Government, and in time of peace it seems to me that it would benefit not only those Army officers, it would benefit this whole country if these men could be engaged in a scientific work, looking to building up the Navy, which would protect them and this country in time of war.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. Can the Senator name a single officer of the Army who is an expert in the manufacture of armor plate?

Mr. PITTMAN. No.

Mr. PENROSE. Or of the Navy, either?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I can not.

Mr. PENROSE. I understood the Senator to state that the Government had Army officers—I suppose he meant Navy officers, but that inaccuracy is not unusual in discussing armor-plate questions—who are experts in this line. Now, can the Senator name a single officer in the Navy or the Army who is an expert in any process connected with armor-plate manufacture?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; there is not.

Mr. PENROSE. Then the Senator's statement was not entirely correct.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the Senator misunderstood me. I said we had expert ordnance men and scientific experts.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not understand the Senator to use the word "ordnance." That, of course, is an entirely different industry.

Mr. PITTMAN. We have experts who are familiar with the industry to this extent——

Mr. PENROSE. There is as much difference between——

Mr. PITTMAN. Pardon me, until I finish the answer.

Mr. PENROSE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. PITTMAN. We have naval officers who are supposed to be sufficiently expert.

Mr. PENROSE. In what?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no doubt that they are sufficiently expert to be placed in the armor-plate factories to watch and see that that work is done according to specifications. We have experts who have sufficient knowledge to inspect that work and determine whether or not it is up to the standard.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator mention a single officer in the Navy who is qualified or who pretends to be qualified to manufacture armor plate?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; nor were there any experts in the Bethlehem Steel Co. until they started in to manufacture; nor was there any expert in the Midvale Co. until they started to manufacture armor plate. There was not an expert in the Carnegie plant until they started to manufacture, but when they got ready to manufacture they had no trouble in getting them. As a matter of fact, they have been getting most of them from the Navy and training them.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me? These private manufacturers spent millions of dollars in experimenting; they spent many thousands of dollars in sending men to Europe to foreign establishments to learn the art. If the Government wants to take 30 years to develop men, and these men have been developed in 20 or 30 years, and spend a million dollars, we are so far apart it is hardly worth while to argue the question. But the Senator spoke about experts, and I challenge him to name a single officer of the Army or Navy who is qualified in the opinion of any sane man and fitted to superintend the manufacture of armor plate.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not mean to say upon the institution of this work we could lay our hands on the naval officer who would be able to take charge of it. In the hearing, as the Senator will recollect, when this very matter came up it was suggested that we would probably employ private men from those very institutions and put them on this work. But that makes no difference. It will take four years, as the Senator says, to have this plant completed. Other witnesses testified various times less than four years. It costs the Government some money to educate its Navy officers as experts in any line, but that is to the benefit of this Government. We should start educating them. The Senator says the more we depend upon these private institutions the better it will be for the Government. According to the Senator, if these men should decide not to manufacture armor plate at all this Government would be absolutely helpless, because we could not get men of ability to attend to it.

The situation is simply this: This Government would not have the same overhead expenditures as private institutions, because it would not have a president receiving $100,000; it would not have a vice president, receiving probably $50,000 a year; it would not have a treasurer, receiving $25,000 a year; and it would not have great bonuses given to its officers. While the salary, for instance, of an officer may be $70,000 or $25,000, according to the public statements the various managers of these plants have been enjoying large bonuses in addition to salaries.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER. I will just remark that the Senator is doing a great deal of the same kind of guessing the committee has done in its report. It is all guesswork.

Mr. PITTMAN. I notice the Senator never objects to any guessing, provided it is on his side. They have done a great deal of guessing this morning, and I think the Senator is very much interested in the preservation of the enormous business in Pennsylvania. I thoroughly sympathize with the Senator in his desire to get as much business for the State of Pennsylvania as he possibly can. I would agree with him if there were not a higher motive on the other side of the question. I think the patriotism of the country is a little superior to personal prosperity.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say on the subject at this time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to state in a few words why I support this bill. It is a bill which proposes to appropriate $11,000,000 for the construction of an armor plant or for the purchase of existing armor plants in carrying out a project which has been in the public mind for a good many years and the wisdom of which Congress has on numerous occasions seriously considered.

Mr. President, the arguments in favor of this enterprise, to my mind, are, first, economy. If anything were needed to demonstrate that the Government of the United States possesses the capacity and efficiency to manufacture the things that it requires, that demonstration was conclusively made in the case of powder. At the time when the discussion first arose whether or not the Government of the United States should undertake to manufacture its own powder for the Army and Navy we were pay 80 cents or more a pound for powder, and when the proposition was advanced for appropriating money and building a powder plant it was argued against that, just as it was argued here to-day, that the Government of the United States could not successfully compete with private manufacturers in the manufacture of powder. It was argued then, as it has been argued to-day, that it was unfair for the Government of the United States to manufacture its own powder and that it should continue to buy the powder from the private manufacturers at such prices as they chose to charge.

Mr. President, our experience in the manufacture of powder has been a conclusive answer to both these arguments. When the Navy plant was established at Indianhead and the Army plant was established, as I recall it, in New Jersey, there began an immediate reduction in the price of powder the private organization offered the Government. It went down from 80 cents to 75 cents, and from 75 cents to 70 cents, and from 70 cents to 65 cents, and from 65 cents to 60 cents, and now the price is materially below that figure—exactly where, I do not know—and the Government manufacture has advanced from year to year, until this year we will manufacture at the Indianhead powder plant for the Navy approximately 5,000,000 pounds of powder, and we will manufacture in the plant for the Army in New Jersey all the powder required for the Army. At what price? The report of the Secretary of War and the report of the Secretary of the Navy show that the cost to the Government of the United States, even including interest on the plant, is only 34 cents per pound.

Mr. President, I maintain that is a conclusive demonstration that the Government of the United States is capable of manufacturing efficiently and economically the things which it requires.

Mr. President, the making of war is a Government business. It ought only to be undertaken when the interests of the Nation require it. We should not permit in the United States any great private institutions to grow up whose prosperity and welfare depend upon the making of war. We want no plutocrats in the United States. If we make the Government of the United States dependent upon private institutions for the manufacture of powder and shot and shell and armor plate, we may be sure that a great interest will grow up, as indeed it has grown up, whose object and desire and whose dividends depend upon war and the preparation for war.

Whenever the subject of preparedness comes up, as it is up at the present time, we will find those great interests with the powerful, wealthy concerns behind them, the great and distinguished stockholders, worth their millions, sitting in high business and social places, using their great influence personally and through the newspapers of the country to compel Congress to go to an extreme in preparing for war.

So, Mr. President, I say that the business of making war being a national business, it ought to be the policy of this country to eliminate from it those great interests of the country whose natural selfishness and whose great power will permit them to influence the Government of the United States in the important matter of war or peace.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do I understand the Senator from Nebraska to say that this bill is for the purpose of eliminating the private manufacturer?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I beg pardon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In view of the remark just made by the Senator from Nebraska, do I understand that it is the purpose of the bill to eliminate the private manufacturer of armor plate?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This bill will be a beginning, Mr. President. It will not be the last chapter written in that story, but it will be a beginning, just as the construction of powder plants at Indianhead and in New Jersey constituted a beginning in the manufacture of powder.

We have had very interesting reasons offered here to-day why this should not be done and very contradictory reasons to-day and on other days. One Senator argues that it should not be done because the armor plate will cost us more than we can purchase it for at private armor institutions. Another says when these private concerns have grown up here and waxed fat and mighty in selling the armor plate to the Government of the United States, what an injustice to deprive them of their lucrative business. I do not know which Senator is right, and I do not care, but as long as the making of war remains a national business we have a right to nationalize the manufacture which is essential to the making of war.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am interested in that phase of the Senator's discussion. After we have this armor-plate plant, would the Senator have a plant to manufacture rifles and sabers and the various accouterments of war, saddles for the Cavalry, and all that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am rather surprised at the question of the Senator from New Hampshire, because we already have very much of that sort in the Army.

Mr. GALLINGER. We are doing very little of it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, we are doing quite a good deal.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not a great deal.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall not take time to read it; but I have a letter from the former Secretary of War, which I shall ask leave to insert in my remarks without reading, which shows that a very large amount of manufacture is now going on, and successfully going on, in the Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, permission to insert the letter is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 15, 1915.

Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. HITCHCOCK: I take pleasure in furnishing you with the information requested in your letter of December 11, 1915 (O. O. file 635.1/2).

There are two Government powder plants—one controlled by the War Department and located at Picatinny Arsenal, Dover, N. J., and the other controlled by the Navy Department and located at Indianhead, Md. All the smokeless powder now being procured by the Army is being manufactured at Picatinny Arsenal, and the output of that establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, was 1,285,000 pounds.

The number of employees on June 30, 1914, was 457, and on June 30, 1915, 373. The factory cost, which includes certain overhead charges only, was approximately 32½ cents per pound for cannon powder and 41½ cents per pound for caliber .30 powder. Including all overhead charges—which can not cover all the overheads to which a private manufacturer is subject and which, of course, include no profit—these figures are 39 cents and 48 cents, respectively.

As stated above, no smokeless powder is being bought from private manufacturers, as the Army powder factory is able to manufacture the entire quantity for which funds have been appropriated. When purchased from private manufacturers the price of smokeless powder for cannon is 53 cents, as fixed by law.

With reference to the arsenals connected with the War Department and the character of the productive work done by them, I may state that they are under the Ordnance Department, which is charged with the duty of designing, manufacturing, and otherwise procuring, and of supplying to the service, and maintaining in repair the artillery, small arms, ammunition, and personal and horse equipments for the fixed defenses and the mobile armies and militia of the United States and its insular possessions; and by authorization supplies, also, practically all of the small arms and equipments of the Navy and the Marine Corps. In this work it employs over 5,500 workmen in six great establishments, which are guarded and generally cared for by 600 enlisted men. Much of the work of the department is of a scientific character, involving the application of the sciences of chemistry, mechanics, and electricity. The amount of this class of work is difficult to set forth accurately, but it will help in forming an estimate of it to know that of the high-class aids to such work known as draftsmen, who translate theoretical study into the specification and illustration which precede production, there are employed 129. An imperfect general measure of the work of a department of construction and supply is furnished by the amount of funds which is expended by the department in carrying the work on hand. For the last two years this amount has averaged for the Ordnance Department nearly $15,000,000 annually, or more than $176,000 per officer. As the work has been done by practically the entire corps, the latter figures give a kind of representation of the amount of responsibility which has, on the average, fallen to each officer, expressed financially.

The present establishments of the Ordnance Department, with their location and uses, are as follows:

Watertown, Mass., manufacturing arsenal.
Springfield, Mass., manufacturing armory.
Watervliet, N. Y., manufacturing arsenal.
Governors Island, N. Y., arsenal of storage, issue, and purchase.
Sandy Hook, N. J., proving ground.
Dover, N. J., powder depot.
Philadelphia, Pa., manufacturing arsenal.
Augusta, Ga., arsenal of storage and repair.
Rock Island, Ill., manufacturing arsenal.
San Antonio, Tex., arsenal of storage and repair.
Benicia, Cal., arsenal of storage and repair.
Manila, P. I., depot of storage and repair.

All of them are used for the issue of supplies, and all of the manufacturing arsenals are also arsenals of storage and repair.

The principal, although not the sole, manufacture of each of the manufacturing establishments is as follows: Of the Watertown Arsenal, seacoast gun carriages; of the Springfield Armory, small arms; of the Watervliet Arsenal, cannon, large and small; of the Frankford Arsenal (Philadelphia, Pa.), ammunition for small arms and mobile artillery; of the Rock Island Arsenal, personal and horse equipments, carriages for mobile artillery, and small arms. All of the muskets, small-arm ammunition, and personal and horse equipments required for the Army are manufactured by the department, but of other classes of ammunition and small arms, of small cannon, and of gun carriages a considerable proportion of the requirements of the service is supplied by private establishments.

Very truly, yours, LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

Mr. GALLINGER. The manufacture of quartermaster's supplies and articles of that character coming under the head of the Senator's argument is relatively small.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It amounts to something like $15,000,000 a year, according to the Secretary of War. It is successful, and it works smoothly; and that $15,000,000 worth is manufactured under the supervision of officers of the United States, and eliminates to that extent private interests, which would be engaged in manufacturing and which would be lobbying here in Washington to swell their profits and their business.

I assert, Mr. President, that this bill will work an economy in the manufacture of armor. I do not know that; I can not prove it, but I believe it, and I point, as I have said, to the case of powder as an indication that there is probable truth in my assertion.

But, Mr. President, what reason have we to think that the present prices of these armor plants for armor plate, if they are the cheapest in the world, will continue cheap. We know that there are only three institutions in the United States that manufacture armor; we know that, whatever the prices are, they fix them; we know that their prices are identical; and what proof have we that those three concerns, practically operating as one, will not upon occasion raise the prices?

Mr. President, in answer to this pathetic plea that we should not disturb those concerns which are manufacturing armor for the United States at a profit, let me say that if it is possible, as Senators have said, for those concerns to manufacture armor plate cheaper than it is manufactured elsewhere in the world, they will find a market for their armor plate in those other countries. If Japan, as has been asserted, is paying now more for her armor plate than these concerns are willing to manufacture it for, they will find a market for their armor plate in Japan. If Russia is paying more than they can manufacture it for, they can find a market for their armor plate in Russia.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But, Mr. President, that argument is a little inconsistent with the high-tariff propaganda which comes from the Republican side. We have been told by Senators on the other side that it was not possible for steel manufacturers in the United States to compete with the world. We have been asked to impose a great tariff and tax upon the people of the United States to keep out disastrous competition from the rest of the world. So, when I hear these stories that these great armor concerns are selling their products to the United States Government at a lower price than the factories in other countries, I am compelled to receive that statement with a grain of allowance.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will.

Mr. OLIVER. Those statements are not made upon mere guesswork of Senators on this side. They are taken from the Yearbook, issued by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, of which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is chairman, and of which his son is secretary; and the Yearbook is prepared as a statistical book by the secretary of that committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And, Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator will allow me, these are statements not as to what it costs to make armor in other countries, but what it costs the governments of other countries to buy armor made in their respective countries.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not know anything about those figures——

Mr. OLIVER. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But I know that they are evidently wrong in the case of Japan. There is no power in the world that can secure from Japan the secrets of her army and her navy. I know that from conversations with high officers in the United States. We can not even ascertain how many vessels Japan is building in her navy yards; we can not ascertain how many men she has employed. Even the financial affairs of Japan are comparatively concealed. That little island Empire has shrouded herself in a cloud of uncertainty. When, therefore, a report, without any apparent explanation, sets forth the fact that in Japan, where labor is so cheap, in Japan—where the raw material is so close at hand in China—that the Japanese Government is paying such an exorbitant price for armor, when everything else she gets is so cheap, I must be excused if I have some doubt as to the accuracy of the figures.

Mr. OLIVER. This is no secret. It would probably be a part of the financial exhibit in Japan, as showing what it pays for the production of this article, just the same as what salaries it pays to its executive and administrative officers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. At any rate, Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can not yield for a speech.

Mr. OLIVER. We do not need to father that document. It comes from your side of the House.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But, Mr. President, personally I should vote for this bill, even though I knew that for the present it would increase the price of our armor. I would vote for this bill, notwithstanding that charge—which I doubt—because I believe that the other benefits to flow from the bill will be incomparably greater than any loss which might result from a temporary increase in the price of armor, if it shall come. I do this, Mr. President, purely because it seems to me the time has come when Congress, now that the matter has come before it, should make it forever impossible for this Government to be robbed and cheated and defrauded by the concerns to which it is paying at the present time something like $6,000,000 a year.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] said we should not bring up these old scandals, but what assurance have we that there may not be new scandals? There was an investigation a number of years ago by authority of the House of Representatives, and I want to read you just a sentence or two from the report of the special committee which made the investigation at that time. I read from page 17 of the House report on the violation of armor-plate contracts, as follows:

> It has been conclusively shown that the inspectors have been satisfied, and the armor plates passed by the most notorious frauds. The efforts of the company, and of its superintendents, Cline, Corey, and Schwab, have been to satisfy your committee that the armor is up to the requirements of the contract, notwithstanding the false reports to inspectors, doctoring of specimens, plugging of plates, fraudulent re-treating of test plates, and "jockeying" of the testing machine. The unblushing character of the frauds to which these men have been parties and the disregard of truth and honesty which they have shown in testifying before your committee render them unworthy of credence.

And yet, Mr. President, we are doing business to-day with some of those same men; and the frauds and outrages that occurred at that time are liable to occur at any time when the Government is practically in the hands of a few concerns from which it is purchasing its necessary supplies of war.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me inquire of the Senator whether that report does not show also that the companies were selling armor at or before the time of this investigation to foreign countries very much cheaper than they were selling the same armor to the United States?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Colorado has asked that question, because it calls to my mind the statement made by the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Herbert, under Grover Cleveland. On page 100 of the hearings which the Senate Naval Committee recently held that report of the Secretary of the Navy is reproduced in full, and I will read a paragraph or two from it, because it is very illuminating. An effort has been made here to account for the fact that the Bethlehem Steel Co. sold armor to Russia for $249 a ton at a time when it was charging the United States a much larger price. Let me read to you the explanation of that fact which is made by the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Herbert, in his report to Congress. He says:

> Here, then, we have the pregnant facts that the two companies in the United States have had a perfect understanding with each other as to what they should charge their own Government; that the five companies in France seem to have had a like understanding with each other as to what they should charge their Government; that the price of armor in France rose gradually from 1891 to 1894, as improvements were adopted, to about the same price as that which was charged by the Bethlehem and Carnegie Cos. to Russia in 1895, after the former company had forced its way into the European market. I am informed upon authority which I believe to be good that about or perhaps before the time of the last contract of the Bethlehem Co. with Russia there was a meeting in Paris of the representatives of the principal, if not all, armor manufacturers of Europe and America.

Mr. President, I have read that to show that we not only have an intolerable condition in the United States, in which three companies absolutely control the price of armor, but we have a meeting in Europe, and nobody knows how many meetings there have been since, in which an international arrangement is made between the armor plate manufacturers of the various countries not to interfere with each other's business.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the Senator does not intimate that he knows anything of an agreement between the manufacturers here and the manufacturers on the other side, does he?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I intimate that the Secretary of the Navy so reported to Congress.

Mr. OLIVER. This is the first intimation that I have ever had that any such thing has been charged.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, this information was not published in the papers.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I do not confine myself to the papers; I have read all these reports.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They do not always appear in the reports. If the Senator will look into the report of Secretary Herbert he will find it there, I am sure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator give the date of Secretary Herbert's report?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was in the year 1896.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator say that the Secretary of the Navy or any official of the United States has ever made a report containing such information since that time?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know of any.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator any information to that effect himself?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not; but, Mr. President, I know that year after year practically identical bids have come in from the three existing armor plate concerns to the Government of the United States. I know there is a law which prohibits the United States from buying armor in other countries, and if the three concerns in the United States make identical bids, what are the people of the United States to do except to buy all their armor at the price named by those three companies?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or do without a Navy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Or to do without a Navy. I say, Mr. President, that condition has become intolerable, and that it is time that the United States constructed its own armor plant, even though it is operated at a cost which will increase the price of our armor. I hope that it will not increase the price of our armor; I believe that it will not increase the price of our armor. I think the experience we have had in the manufacture of powder demonstrates that it need not do so; but so long as we are compelled to put inspectors in these plants to examine and inspect the armor which is manufactured and to watch the manufacturers as criminals are watched, it is time that we had our own factories and made our own armor, and for that reason and also for the other reasons I have stated, Mr. President, I favor the passage of this bill.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me one moment, I merely wish to call attention to the fact that no article of any kind manufactured anywhere for the United States Government is manufactured except under the eye of an inspector, and to intimate that a manufacturer is a criminal because he has to submit to having an inspector in his works is unworthy of the Senator from Nebraska or of any other Senator.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. KERN. I was about to move an executive session, after which I wanted to move to take a recess.

Mr. HARDING. I merely desire to give a notice.

Mr. KERN. I will yield to the Senator, if he so desires.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to give notice that following the address of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], of which he gave notice this morning, after the morning hour to-morrow, I should like to address myself for a short time to the pending measure.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Indiana will permit me to address an inquiry to him, I will state that I am informed that at the proper time he intends to ask for a recess until to-morrow. Is that correct?

Mr. KERN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PENROSE. I was going to suggest to the Senator that he fix 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, instead of 12, for the hour of meeting, if that be agreeable to him.

Mr. KERN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PENROSE. That will accommodate Senators who have not had an opportunity to speak on the armor-plate bill.

Mr. KERN. I will say to the Senator that it was the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that we take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, so that I think it will be generally agreeable.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, in self-protection, is going to announce now that 11 o'clock to-morrow morning he will recognize the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and then the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], and other Senators who desire to address the Senate must give in their names.

Mr. PENROSE. I gave notice this morning that I intended to address the Senate after my colleague the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] had spoken on this bill. Therefore, I understand I am third, although I would cheerfully follow the Senator from Ohio.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not notice that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] had given notice. The order, then, will be the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], and by that time the Chair thinks it will be 4 o'clock.

Mr. CUMMINS. What will become of the rest of us?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair simply makes the statement as a matter of protection to the Chair.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 17 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 21, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 20, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God of hosts, King of Kings and Lord of Lords, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee that Thou hast not left Thy children to grope their way in darkness, but that all down through the ages comes a cloud of witnesses in testimony of Thy love and fatherly care. Especially do we thank Thee for that spirit ever going out from Thee in quest of the hearts of men. May we open our hearts to that influence and be ready to follow where it leads, that we may fulfill every duty devolving upon us in private or in public life. In the spirit of Him who gave his life that we might know Thee and live to larger life and nobler purposes. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 18, 1916, was read and approved.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12766, the Army reorganization bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12766.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. GARDNER. To propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER. Whether this rule enables this bill to take precedence over the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it does.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the Chair hear me for a minute?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair will hear the gentleman, with this remark, that this rule goes into as much detail as any rule the Chair ever saw in the House.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman make a point of order?

Mr. GARDNER. No; I just make a parliamentary inquiry. I ask that the Chair will hear me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], my purpose is not to delay a vote on the bill, but to delay a vote on the Kahn amendment, because I think the Kahn amendment is really a vote on the bill. With the early meeting of the House, bringing up a vote on the Kahn amendment early in the day, when that is the principal vote in the bill, I think I ought to——

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, the gentleman has a remedy in that respect. The gentleman can make the point of no quorum.

Mr. GARDNER. Well, if the gentleman prefers——

Mr. GARRETT. I do not prefer. I just make the suggestion.

Mr. GARDNER. I can assure the gentleman that what I want is to make an arrangement to take a vote on the Kahn amendment to-morrow, instead of to-day.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I can not see any reason for postponing a vote on this proposition, and when we go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union I have no doubt the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and myself will be able to agree upon some time, so that the vote probably will not come until 12 o'clock, or probably after that, and by that time the House will be full.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, this rule under which this bill is being considered simply says that "it shall be in order on all legislative days except Wednesdays." Now, that is simply giving this bill the same precedence that an appropriation bill has. It certainly can not give it more, because the appropriation bills have the highest privilege. This merely makes this bill in order; it does not say a word about its being privileged.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been already ruled that an appropriation bill on a Monday has not privilege over Monday business. I refer the Speaker to the ruling on January 16, 1911. It is cited under paragraph 884A of the Manual. In the case to which I refer there arose a question whether a motion to discharge a committee under the Monday rule had or had not preference over a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It was argued out, and the argument covered a number of pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and finally it was decided by the House overruling the Speaker that a motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of a bill under this rule, the Monday rule, is of higher privilege than a motion to consider an appropriation bill on a suspension Monday. If a motion under the Monday rule was of higher privilege than a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, a fortiori the calling of the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, which is the first business under the Monday rule, must have preference to a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I hold that the preference accorded this bill under the rule is only that which is accorded to appropriation bills under the general rules of the House. That is the question to which my parliamentary inquiry relates. I should be glad to have the Chair give an opinion on that.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not concur in the thought expressed by my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], that the sole matter for the consideration of the Chair is the language quoted, namely, that "the bill shall be in order on all legislative days except Wednesdays." There are other parts of the rule that must be taken into consideration with that language.

I refer to this, for instance—and I call it to the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts, for whose opinion as a parliamentarian I have the very greatest respect, as he knows—"that while the bill is under consideration the House shall meet at 11 o'clock antemeridian and during general debate." Now, on Saturday last the House adjourned, and the announcement of the Chair was that we adjourned until 11 o'clock to-day. That necessarily implied that this bill was under consideration, under the special rule. Otherwise we would have met at 12 o'clock. So that is a construction——

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. No objection being made to the Chair's announcement, it would hardly be considered binding as a construction of the rule, would it?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not think the RECORD shows, but I think an inquiry was made about that at the time.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman at my left [Mr. MANN], who follows these things, is shaking his head vigorously.

Mr. GARRETT. I should say that in the absence of objection acquiescence would be implied.

Mr. GARDNER. It has never been ruled so in this House.

Mr. GARRETT. It would have been possible, Mr. Speaker, to have drawn a more drastic rule than this. This is not a very drastic rule. It would have been possible to present a rule to keep the House in continuous session and provide recesses of the Committee of the Whole at fixed hours. But in the judgment of the Committee on Rules that was not desirable, because some emergency, we realized, might arise, so that it might be necessary for the hands of the House not to be tied even for the consideration of this bill, and therefore we refrained from drawing a resolution which would keep the House in continuous session and providing for recesses as we could have done. But the Committee on Rules did provide—and I am suggesting now only what was in the thought of the Committee on Rules at the time—that while the bill was under consideration the House should meet at 11 o'clock, and that the bill should be in order on all legislative days except Wednesdays, and the House acquiesced by not objecting on Saturday when we adjourned at that time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] as to the effect of the action of the Speaker in declaring that the House should meet at 11 o'clock this morning. I think he was right about that. I think we meet at 11 o'clock every morning until the pending bill is finally disposed of. As a matter of fact, the bill was not under consideration in the House at the time we adjourned. The bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the committee is where it is under consideration. But I take it that that language means that until the House has concluded the consideration of the bill the House shall meet at 11 o'clock every morning.

I hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] will not insist upon an answer even to his parliamentary inquiry. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes the bill in order. It simply gives it the ordinary privileged status, such as revenue legislation has and appropriation bills have. When the committee discharge rule was provided, it said that a motion on the calendar to discharge a committee could be called up following the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and the test was had in the House on the question as to whether it was in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of an appropriation bill, a highly privileged motion. I do not now recall distinctly what Mr. Speaker CANNON ruled upon the subject, or whether he was overruled or sustained by the House. My recollection, refreshed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is that Mr. Speaker CANNON held that the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of an appropriation bill was in order at any time, and that if the House desired to proceed with the Unanimous Consent Calendar, or the Committee Discharge Calendar, or the Suspension Calendar, it had that privilege of voting down the motion; and that on appeal from the decision of the Chair, or on submission by the Chair of the question to the House, Mr. Speaker CANNON was overruled, and the House decided that the motion to discharge a committee, on the calendar on suspension day, had a prior privilege over a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Since that time the Suspension Calendar has been put ahead of the Committee Discharge Calendar, but there has been no change in the right of a motion to discharge a committee other than making it follow the Suspension Calendar.

Now, I do not want to see that ruling of the House overturned, so that hereafter every appropriating committee which has bills on the calendar will seek, on unanimous-consent day, to do away with the Unanimous Consent Calendar, which is the safety valve of the House for small bills at this time, and move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I do not see how the Speaker could hold that the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is in order as against the motion to discharge, unless he opens the way for the motions to which I have referred, to be made in the future. I hope that under the circumstances the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]—because he and I and the rest of the House on this side are anxious to have preparedness enacted into law, although we are not so anxious about the present bill—will not insist upon the Speaker answering his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARDNER. Under the circumstances I will withdraw my parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is much obliged to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

S. 4603. An act to authorize the Jackson Highway Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tom Beckby, commonly called "Tombigbee," River at Princes Lower Landing, near Jackson, Ala.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4603. An act to authorize the Jackson Highway Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tom Beckby, commonly called "Tombigbee," River at Princes Lower Landing, near Jackson, Ala.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

TENNESSEE FICKLIN.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent at this point to present a resolution. One of the employees of this House has died, and his widow is here, and she has not the money to take his body home. We can not pass the usual resolution this morning except by unanimous consent, because the resolution has not been presented to the House on a previous day. I therefore ask unanimous consent to present this resolution, which provides the ordinary expenses in cases of this kind.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to present a resolution which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 178.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Tennessee Ficklin, widow of E. D. Ficklin, late a messenger on the rolls of the House, an amount equal to six months of his compensation as such employee and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray the funeral expenses of said E. D. Ficklin.

Mr. MANN. This is the usual resolution?

Mr. LLOYD. This is the usual resolution, but it has not gone through the box.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

On motion of Mr. HAY, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KAHN: Amend, page 13, line 12, by striking out the words "one hundred and forty" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "two hundred and twenty," and add at the end of the section the following: "That not exceeding 80,000 of the force provided in this section shall be distributed among the various arms of the service in such manner and in such proportion as the President may prescribe."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, before we go into that question——

Mr. KAHN. I wish to ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment.

Mr. HAY. I have no objection to doing that, if you will just give me one moment. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inserting in the RECORD a statement from the War College as to the number of trained men in the United States. When Gen. Bliss, Assistant Chief of Staff, was before the committee, he was asked by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN], a member of the committee, to put in the record a statement as to the number of trained men in the country, and on page 27 of the hearings he presents that statement, which is as follows:

No data are available from which an accurate estimate can be made of the number of men between the ages of 16 and 45 years now in the country who have had some military training; therefore, the following figures should be regarded as only approximately correct and considered in the light of the following more or less arbitrary assumptions upon which they are based, namely:

(a) That the average age of enlisted men at date of discharge was 29 years.

(b) That 50 per cent of the men discharged from the Regular Army reenlist therein (data informally obtained from The Adjutant General).

(c) That the average age of students at date of graduation from schools and colleges was 21 years.

(d) That the deaths among the numbers of men who have had military training has averaged approximately 1 per cent per year.

The amount of military training which these 1,494,255 men have had varies from that received during several complete enlistments in the Regular Army to the limited instruction possible during one day's service in the Organized Militia or with a cadet organization at a civil educational institution. Furthermore, except as stated in the following paragraph, the Government has no knowledge of the present addresses of these men or of the number that would be willing to volunteer for service in time of war.

As the figures quoted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] the other day came from the War College, I just simply wanted to show another set of figures from the War College.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the number given by the War College—a million and some odd men—mean the number who have had military training in the United States or the number who are now trained?

Mr. HAY. The number who are now trained.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I had excellent military training 20 years ago, but I do not think I have any training now.

Mr. HAY. I am presenting these figures just to show how the War College or the General Staff can juggle with figures when they feel like doing it, that is all.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Did not the gentleman call up the Secretary of War since I published my statement and ask him as to the accuracy of it?

Mr. HAY. I do not think I am called upon to state private conversations between myself and the Secretary of War.

Mr. GARDNER. I am going to introduce a resolution asking The Adjutant General's figures on that. Will the gentleman support that resolution?

Mr. HAY. Why, sure; yes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is what the gentleman wants to put in the RECORD a statement now from the War College or a statement that was made in the hearings?

Mr. HAY. A statement in the hearings some time in January.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be better to have a statement made by the War College to the gentleman and inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. HAY. The War College has already made a statement, which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has put in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. The Secretary of War made a statement and somebody testified and has made a statement. It seems to me that it might be advisable to have a statement from the official of the War College representing the War College.

Mr. HAY. As a matter of fact, The Adjutant General is the man that ought to make the statement, for he has all the figures. I want to put this in the RECORD to show, as the New York Sun stated in an editorial yesterday, that the General Staff had not forgotten how to play strategy in furnishing figures for the purpose of discounting what I had stated in my report.

Mr. MANN. If the War College has made a statement before the committee to one thing and somebody has testified to another and the Secretary of War has made a statement which is in another direction, I should think the gentleman representing the House would get a statement from the War College.

Mr. HAY. I do not want any statement from the War College, but I will get a statement from The Adjutant General, who has charge of the records and is supposed to be the man that can tell us how the matter is. I think, however, I have the right to print this under the general leave to print.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by striking out the word "eighty," before the word "thousand," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "forty-five," and to strike out the word "service" and insert in lieu thereof the word "line."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the amendment so that it will read:
"That not exceeding 45,000 of the force provided in this section shall be distributed among the various arms of the line in such manner and in such proportion as the President may prescribe."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Reserving the right to object, is this the amendment which proposes to increase the number of men in the Army that he has modified?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Reducing the number——

Mr. KAHN. It does not reduce it. Under the bill now under consideration the Army at full war strength would be approximately 175,000 men. If there be imminence of war, the President has a right, under the provisions of the bill under discussion to increase the Army to the full statutory strength, which would give approximately 175,000 men; that would leave a surplus of 45,000 men unassigned, and my amendment proposes to give the President authority to assign those men to such additional units and in such arms of the service as he may deem best for the country.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It would leave the surplus of 45,000 in the event that the gentleman's amendment be adopted.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, we would like to have the amendment put in proper form, and I would like to ask the gentleman if the form adopted in 1899 would not cover the case better. That form was as follows:

To meet the present exigencies of the military service, the President is hereby authorized to maintain the Regular Army at a strength of not exceeding 65,000 enlisted men, to be distributed amongst the several branches of the service, including the Signal Corps, according to the needs of each. Such increased regular force shall continue in service only during the necessity therefor.

Now, under the amendment as proposed the President has so little power that I want to submit to the gentleman whether this is not the better form. It has been construed so as to allow a Cavalry company to be increased to 100 men——

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asked unanimous consent to modify his amendment so as to read as reported by the Clerk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified, and as it stands at present.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 12, strike out the words "one hundred and forty" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "two hundred and twenty," and add at the end of the section the following: "that not exceeding 45,000 of the force provided in this section shall be distributed among the various arms of the line in such manner and in such proportion as the President may prescribe."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] if he desires to agree on a time for debate upon this amendment?

Mr. KAHN. I should be pleased to agree on time with the gentleman. I have requests over here now for approximately 1 hour and 20 minutes, and another request was just this minute made for 10 minutes more.

Mr. HAY. Of course the gentleman can accumulate requests. I have a great many requests myself, but we can not spend the whole day upon this proposition. It was very fully debated in general debate. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that there shall be 45 minutes of debate on a side on this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Let me suggest to the gentleman that probably this is the most vital feature of the bill upon which there is a difference of opinion.

Mr. HAY. I think an hour and a half of debate after the general debate we have had is amply sufficient.

Mr. MANN. There was not very much general debate upon this subject.

Mr. HAY. I thought every one who spoke at all spoke on the strength of the Army, so far as I heard.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think we will not lose any time by allowing considerable latitude on this amendment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to do that. I am offering an hour and a half of debate.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman will make more time than that by allowing three hours.

Mr. MANN. Of course we are all anxious to expedite the passage of the bill; but general debate, I would suggest to the gentleman, was originally proposed at 30 hours.

Mr. HAY. Twenty-four.

Mr. MANN. No; it was originally at 30 hours. The gentleman must know that.

Mr. HAY. I do not.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will certainly recall——

Mr. HAY. Oh, some one might have said they wanted 30 hours, but the rule asked for 24 hours.

Mr. MANN. I could remind the gentleman in a moment in private conversation of a suggestion which was made in private conversation, but I do not repeat private conversations. It was cut down from 30 hours to 24 hours and then to 10 hours, all of which met with my approval. Here is a vital feature of the bill, and gentlemen really desire to be heard upon it. I think the gentleman can afford to give more time than 45 minutes on a side.

Mr. HAY. How much time does the gentleman from California suggest?

Mr. KAHN. I suggest three hours all told, an hour and a half on a side. That I think will allow ample debate. I feel confident that there is no other section of the bill which will take up so much time, and I think it will be in the interest of the bill that that amount of time be given.

Mr. HAY. Will not the gentleman be satisfied with an hour on a side?

Mr. MANN. Make it an hour and a quarter.

Mr. HAY. Very well. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that there shall be two hours and a half of debate upon this section and all amendments thereto and to the amendments to the section, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the other half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section—section 7—and all amendments thereto shall be concluded at the end of two hours and a half, one half of that time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand that if that amount of time only is allowed it will be all taken up on this side by those who have already made requests for time. There are some of us here who have not made any requests up to this time who desire to say something in a very few minutes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from California will have to meet that condition by cutting down the amount of time allowed to each gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. I think I can accommodate the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from California if he will be able to give me five or ten minutes? I am for the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. I can not give the gentleman as much as that, but I can give him some time.

Mr. HULBERT. Five minutes?

Mr. KAHN. Three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the existing law provides for an enlisted force in the line of the Army of 100,000 men. That law was enacted in 1901. Never at any time under that law until very recently have we ever had 100,000 enlisted men in the Army. At the time the law of 1901 was passed there were a great many more men in the Army than we had along about 1903. The Army was materially cut down. At one time since the Spanish-American War we had a force of 57,000 men. That force has gradually been expanded as the necessities of the Government increased. When we constructed fortifications in our insular possessions we needed additional men and increased the Army. The matter was in the hands of the Executive. All the Presidents have used the power wisely and judiciously. The expense for additional men was voted by Congress from time to time and the increments were small and did not materially add to the cost of the Army. This amendment provides for 220,000 men. That does not say that the President must immediately enlist them, but it gives him authority if in his judgment he thinks it advisable to enlist them, just as does the existing law, which fixes the maximum strength at 100,000 men. I can conceive of many conditions under which such a step would be advisable on the part of the Executive. The pending bill, while it provides a force of 140,000 men, also provides that in the imminence of war the President may expand the Army so that it will include 20,700 men in the Cavalry, 21,816 in the Field Artillery, 25,203 in the Coast Artillery Corps, 77,280 in the Infantry, 4,500 in the Engineers, 1,932 in the Porto Rico Regiment, recruits aggregating 7,813, cadet companies 3,150 men, Military Academy 632, Indian scouts 75 men—a total number of men of the line amounting to 163,101 plus 12,000 men in the Philippine Scouts. That would make a total of about 175,000 men. That is the war strength of the line under the Hay bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. How many real fighting men would there be in that 175,000?

Mr. KAHN. All fighting men. That does not include the staff. That does not include the Quartermaster's Department, nor the Hospital Corps, nor any of the other men who supply the necessities for the Army. They would aggregate about 32,000 more.

Mr. MADDEN. What is meant by Military Academy? Are those the students there?

Mr. KAHN. No, indeed. There are 635 men at the Military Academy who are in the line of the Army, and who could be called to the front immediately if the War Department so desired.

Mr. MADDEN. What is meant by that statement of recruits there?

Mr. KAHN. Under this bill the strength is fixed at 140,000 men, not including recruits at various stations to the number of 5 per cent. In other words——

Mr. MADDEN. Men who have not yet qualified?

Mr. KAHN. Men who have not been assigned to particular organizations but who have been accepted in the Army; they have been accepted and are to be distributed to the various organizations.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I know the gentleman desires to be accurate and I will call his attention to the fact that the first paragraph says the President "shall," not that he "may," in the imminence of war add these men. Where he is allowed discretion is in the latter part of the bill, but it says here that he "shall" add these men.

Mr. KAHN. That is the language, as I understand it, of the existing law, yet the President has never added the full number. No Executive will ever abuse his authority, and, after all, Congress finally would have to provide the appropriations for any increase. The language in the latter part of the amendment would permit the President to organize new units from a force of 45,000 men. It would enable him to put all or any portion in the Infantry, Cavalry, Coast Artillery, or Field Artillery, as circumstances might require. I believe that the time has come when we should be able, even in times of peace, to expand our Army very substantially, if in the judgment of the President such a course is necessary. For that reason I hope the amendment will prevail. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. How much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used seven minutes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the committee will not adopt this amendment. I have great respect for my friend and colleague on the committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], for his patriotism and for his ability as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, but this matter has already been threshed out in the committee. We have really given to the War Department a larger Army than the President himself has asked for, and to adopt this amendment now would mean that this bill would have to be returned to the Committee on Military Affairs after it has been agreed upon and practically redrafted. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that that argument is sufficient unto itself as an answer to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. Now, I need not add anything, Mr. Chairman, to the argument made here the other day by the distinguished chairman of this committee that while we have had on the statute books since 1901 a law authorizing a maximum strength of 100,000 in the line of our Army we have never yet reached that point. For 15 years we have failed to have an Army equal to the maximum strength authorized by law, and the reasons that the chairman gave for that the other day are unanswerable. We must either adopt compulsory service in this country in order to get a large standing Army or we must increase the pay to such an extent that the Government can compete with private employers. This country is not yet ready, in my humble judgment, for either one of those two things. We do not want compulsory service, and the country will not stand for an enormous expenditure of money in order to meet competition with private enterprise. I say, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment ought to be defeated because it is impracticable; because we have increased the Army beyond even the limit asked for by the President; because we have placed it at a point as high as we can practically hope to reach; and, in the last place, because to adopt this amendment would mean that the bill would be sent back to the committee and the whole of it redrafted. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD].

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, as a new Member of this House at this time I should like to remain silent, but it appears to me that there is a clear and well-defined duty to speak. I am privileged by the expression of opinion of every Representative from the State of New York on the minority side to say that we are unalterably opposed to this bill as it is written, and in favor of this amendment. I am in great sympathy with what was said here on last Saturday that we should approach the consideration of this bill from a nonpolitical standpoint. There is no doubt that that is our desire. There is no doubt that that is what we will do. I am also in great sympathy or, rather, greatly interested in what was said here last Saturday to the effect that it would be a great and glorious thing if, when the vote is taken on this bill, we could vote for it unanimously as it is written. I wish we might, but if we did we would have no more satisfaction than we would on the morning of the 5th of July each year when we wake up in the morning and find the skyrockets have been shot off, the Roman candles are gone, and the caps and crackers are exploded. That is not my opinion alone, as I gather from a reading of the evidence that was taken by the Military Committee, but it is the opinion of every military authority in the United States to-day, and why not say so and let the people know it? The time has come when the people of the United States are looking to us and saying you can not talk preparedness and vote for pacificism.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I will yield.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman consider Gen. Nelson A. Miles an authority on military matters?

Mr. SANFORD. He used to be. I do not know whether he is now or not.

Mr. GORDON. He does not agree with you.

Mr. SANFORD. I will make clear the point I have made. In the hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs the question was asked of Gen. Wood:

> You regard the organizations as more valuable than simply having more men?

His answer was this:

> Gen. WOOD. If you are limited to 140,000 men, I should fill up the present organization and then create new ones, especially in the Field Artillery, up to the limit of 140,000, but if you do only that you will not have done much for the security of the country. You will not have taken any adequate measure of defense.

And that is the truth, and every man who has studied this question, whether he is a military authority or not, knows it. Capt. Kilbourne, of the General Staff, when questioned by the chairman of this committee, who was speaking of an Army of 140,000 men, said:

> Capt. KILBOURNE. Why, Mr. Hay, I feel this way about that. Unless this country is willing to have a military organization of some kind of sufficient strength to meet any nation which might envy us or might desire to cross our policies, I agree with you, sir, it does seem to be idle to do anything.

It is idle to do anything if we are going to pass this bill, in the judgment of those men who know and whose testimony has been taken in 1,465 pages of the record.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. SANFORD. I have not the time to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SANFORD. So I say that if we do pass this bill as it is written we have not done the thing that we have been talking about. It is a discouraging and a disappointing thing to see men stand on this floor and become eloquent for preparedness and then come and say here, "Let us be unanimous in voting to do that which is practically nothing in the judgment of the military men."

I do not say we should follow the military men alone. I think it was John Adams who said:

> The cardinal duty of a statesman, the principal duty of a statesman, is to provide for the common defense.

Let us try to be statesmen. That does not mean that we should follow blindly the authorities, but we should consider their testimony and not speak of it wholly as superficial. People of this country may not know for many months what we have done here in this long bill of some 90 pages. We may be able, in the words of the bill, to conceal its real meaning from the people who are watching and waiting in this country, but there are nations in Europe that will know what we have done when we shall have finished. I believe in framing a military policy without picking out your enemy; but in this crisis, in the condition in which this country finds itself to-day, surrounded by the most intense vitalities that ever prevailed in the world, if democracy can do no better than is proposed by the bill, democracy is not doing much.

The world will know what we have done here. I say to you, in the darkness and quiet of night you can scare away a burglar, if you will, with a toy pistol or perhaps with a shining top, but when you are going after a murderer in the full glare of the sunshine it is utter folly to draw a gun unless you know it is loaded.

This bill provides what? It provides, as it is written, that at the end of four years we shall have added so much that we will have an army of fifty or sixty thousand men for the defense of continental United States; an army of such magnificent size that at the end of four years it will be relatively as big, according to the population of this country, as our Regular Army was at the opening of the Civil War, and no bigger—and everybody knows that at that time it was not big enough to be an adequate police force.

That is not what the people are waiting for. They are waiting for the real solution of this problem; and whatever it is that you and I may wish, our plain duty is to solve this problem, and solve it as if we meant business. The program of the War College is not extravagant. It calls for 250,000 men in the Regular Army, and with a scheme of enlistment that would in eight years put into the reserve of the Regular Army 379,000 men, making in all a half million available men with Regular Army training. It is further proposed to supplement this with a half million men partially trained as citizen soldiers, so that in an emergency we could start with an army of approximately 1,000,000 men.

They tell us at the same time that if we should be in a war we would need an army of twice that size, or 2,000,000 men, so that they require an army that would in an emergency require us only to double our forces. The scheme provided in this bill would require us in an emergency to produce an army twenty times the size of the army provided in the bill. Is that preparation or is it pacifism?

I do not pretend to be a military authority, but I pretend to be competent to read this evidence and know what it means. I do claim to be competent to reflect in this House to-day the sentiments of the people of New York, who are not afraid of anything except the unnecessary weakness of Democracy. Gentlemen have said here that we must not go to compulsory service, although we have compulsory service in this country to-day and have had it since the beginning. In this country we have always placed the obligation of service in time of war on the untrained civilians generally.

The only question is, Shall we train our men beforehand in time of peace, to place them in a position to carry the obligation that we place upon them? It is not a friendly thing to the American people to say, "No; you need not train; we are going to be awfully good to you," because you know, and the sooner they know the better, that we already have compulsory service in this country.

I do not say we should adopt compulsory universal training now, but I say we should adopt some one of the systems that our military authorities have pointed out that would make us competent in case of need. Yes; we should approach this subject from a nonpolitical standpoint, but there is such a thing as being obligated to meet, even in politics, the question of what is to be the quality of your service. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] is recognized.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I have studied this question. I had hoped that I would have the pleasure of offering this amendment, because I believe that this is the most vital thing that is contained in this bill.

While it may be true that men can not fight battles without officers, it is equally true that officers can not fight battles without men. We have presented to us to-day the horrible spectacle of a skeleton army of American soldiers chasing a Mexican army of skeleton soldiers. Were their opponents more worthy, already the skeletons of the American soldiers would lie bleaching on the plains of Mexico. I feel very strongly upon this subject, and my feeling is based upon a thorough conviction. We owe a duty to this Nation, and while we are going about this preparation for defense and the creation of a Military Establishment, let us meet the requirements of the time. Let us not fool ourselves; let us acknowledge that the only person one can fool is himself.

I will agree that if we are to prepare either officers or men, the one not the other, that we had much better prepare officers, for it takes longer to educate and train an officer than it does a private. I realize that there is a large body of our American people living between the Allegheny and Rocky Mountains who are opposed to the organization of a military body equal to the requirements of this country, and I believe that it is in deference to the wishes of the Representatives from this section that the skeleton-army plan has been adopted in this bill. I have listened to much praise of the efficiency of the Squirrel Shooters from Kentucky and Tennessee, and I know of the ability of the Texas cowboy. I have lived among these people and I have the highest respect for their patriotism and marksmanship, but the facts seem to indicate that the Army is not made up of volunteers from the country. Our recruiting stations are largely established in the cities, and over 70 per cent of the men in the Army are recruited from the cities. When war is declared the first body of volunteers comes from the city, because it is there that the newspapers are able to arouse the patriotism and enthusiasm of our people first. The testimony before the Military Committee shows that 80 per cent of these recruits never had a gun in their hands before enlistment. In the time of stress, therefore, before the ranks of our organization can be filled to anything like efficiency, some force must be had to hold the invader, so that we can recruit and train soldiers for our defense. The passage of this bill in this form would, in my mind, be ridiculous if it were not pathetic. I sincerely trust, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted.

The people of our cities and towns are aroused and look to us for action as indicated by the resolutions passed by the conference of the mayors at St. Louis, which I ask unanimous consent to print as an extension of my remarks.

NATIONAL DEFENSE—CONFERENCE OF MAYORS AND MAYORS' COMMITTEES.

[Resolutions unanimously adopted at St. Louis, Mar. 4, 1916.]

Whereas the purpose of the establishment of the Republic was, among other things, to provide for the common defense and thereby to secure to ourselves the blessings of liberty and peace; and

Whereas this Nation is to-day without adequate defense by sea or land and is almost wholly without the means to protect its territory, defend its people, or safeguard its institutions against possible aggression; and

Whereas for the common national defense there are required an adequate Navy, ample coast defense, a mobile army, and a mobilization of the organized physical resources of the Nation; and

Whereas the General Board of the Navy has reported to the Secretary of the Navy that "our present Navy is not sufficient to give due weight to the diplomatic remonstrance of the United States in peace nor to enforce its policies in war"; and

Whereas we believe that the Navy should be increased with all speed until we shall have become the first naval power of the world, with strength on the Atlantic equal to that of any other power upon the ocean, and with additional strength upon the Pacific such as to make of us the first naval power upon that ocean; and

Whereas the General Staff of the Army has submitted to the War Department a plan for a moderate increase of the Regular Army and for the organization, distribution, and equipment thereof, and for the increase and complete manning of coast defenses: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the mayors and members of mayors' committees upon national defense of the cities of the United States, in convention assembled, do hereby demand the immediate authorization by Congress of the building program of the General Board of the Navy of July 30, 1915, together with such additions and modifications as their expert knowledge and experience may indicate to be necessary at this time. And we do further demand that the personnel of the Navy be increased in conformity with the requirements of the service, as interpreted by the General Board.

Resolved, That we demand the increase and complete manning of coast defenses, as recommended by the General Staff.

Resolved, That we demand the immediate increase, organization, and disposition of the Regular Army, as recommended by the General Staff.

Resolved, That recognizing the military obligation equally with the civic obligation as a fundamental duty of Democratic citizenship in a Republic, and to establish a system which will affect alike every man in the Republic, we approve and recommend the adoption of universal military training under Federal control throughout the United States.

Resolved, That we approve and recommend the immediate formulation of plans by the Federal Government for the organization and mobilization of the physical resources of the country, and to that end, among other things, we specifically recommend:

That all arsenals, ordnance, rifle, and other munition-producing plants supported by Federal appropriation be located at a distance from the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards and from the Canadian and Mexican borders, as recommended in the recent reports of the General Staff of the Army.

That steps be taken by the Federal Government to effect in time of peace and standardization of all material which may be required by the Government in time of war.

That the transportation facilities, industries, and general resources of the country be so marshaled and organized as to make them promptly available for service upon the outbreak of war.

That Federal legislation to effectuate the foregoing be enacted by the present Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be at once transmitted to the Senate and to the House of Representatives, and that a copy thereof be transmitted at once to each Senator and Representative of the National Congress.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that both the section and the proposed amendment to it are limitations and not authorizations. Neither the section nor the gentleman's amendment to it would put any more men into the service. The section provides:

That the total enlisted force of the line of the Army shall not exceed at any one time 140,000, except as provided for in section 1 of this act.

The amendment proposed simply strikes out "140" and inserts "220." It still remains a limitation only.

The second section of the bill provides for the new organization of Cavalry regiments. It prescribes the number and character of officers and machine guns. Section 3 prescribes the organization of Field Artillery, with its officers, regiments, guns, and equipment. Section 4 provides for the organization of the Coast Artillery Corps. Section 5 provides for the organization of the Corps of Engineers. Section 6 provides for the organization of the Infantry. Each of these sections provides for the increases in a particular branch of the service. Some of the increases are small, others larger. If gentlemen really desired to increase the size of the Army, these are the sections they should have proposed to amend, not section 7, which is but a limitation and prescribes only a peace footing.

The gentleman's amendment refers to the "force provided in this section," but there is no force provided in this section. This is an increase of the limitation on the force but not an addition.

Mr. KAHN. I will say to the gentleman that that has been amended this morning.

Mr. GARDNER. Is not the gentleman aware that there are a great many more than 140,000 troops authorized in this bill, and that this section 7 simply says that of those authorized not more than 140,000 shall be recruited?

Mr. TOWNER. I am well aware of that, if you mean the war strength of the forces; but that does not change the point I make.

Mr. GARDNER. What does the gentleman mean by the war strength? I find no such statement in the bill.

Mr. TOWNER. In the express terms of section 7, which we are considering, it is provided that 140,000 shall constitute the maximum strength of the Army, "except as provided for in section 1 of this act."

Section 1 provides that when in the judgment of the President war becomes imminent all of said organizations—that shall be below the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law shall be raised forthwith to that strength, and shall be maintained as nearly as possible thereat so long as war or the imminence of war shall continue.

That is what is meant by war strength. It is the maximum number of men provided for in sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of this bill. The total is 207,335, as stated in the report of the committee. One hundred and forty thousand is the peace footing. Two hundred and seven thousand three hundred and thirty-five is the war footing of the Army as provided in this bill. The President, if he so determines, on the day after he shall sign this bill can direct that the Army shall be recruited at once to 207,335 men.

That is the elastic, expansive feature of the bill. There are officers and equipment provided for 207,335 men, but they are not called into service and we are not required to pay them until they are needed.

To increase the limitation without increasing the number of regiments would destroy the expansive feature of our policy. Unless gentlemen desire to do that they should vote against this amendment. If the amendment should pass, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] well says, this bill would have to be recommitted for reconstruction so that the other provisions of the bill could be brought in harmony with this change.

SIZE OF THE ARMY.

This is a bill to reorganize the Army and to increase its size and efficiency. It makes material increases in the Regular Establishment. It increases the minimum strength of the Army nearly 50 per cent. It adds 10 regiments of Infantry, 6 regiments of Field Artillery, 52 companies of Coast Artillery, 15 companies of Engineers, and 4 Aero squadrons. It adds to our present permanent force 40,000 men and 7,450 officers. Seven hundred and eighty-six officers have been added to train the militia and students in schools and colleges. The Aviation section has been increased by 73 officers and 720 men.

This will make a force in our Regular Establishment of 140,000 men, which could immediately be increased under the provisions of this bill by order of the President to 207,335 men. To this available force must be added 129,000 officers and men now in the National Guard, which may be increased under the provisions of this bill to 425,000. We already have a carefully considered and effective Volunteer Army law which provides a method of increasing the Army in case of war to any required number. It is expected that under the operation of this bill we will soon have a first line of 500,000 men subject to immediate call for service.

There is great difference of opinion as to what would constitute a reasonable increase of the Army. This difference is not confined to those who have no technical knowledge or actual experience in military matters. It is as marked among the military experts as among the people generally. It is often suggested we should follow the advice of those especially qualified to advise; but this can not be done when there is such a wide difference among those who are especially qualified. There is practical agreement that we must provide for substantial increases, but to what extent and in what manner these increases should be made there is the widest divergence of opinion. If we shall assume that we should provide for an Army of 500,000 men, either in actual service or prepared for immediate service if necessary, and if we further assume that provision should be made as to organization, arms, ammunition, and equipment for 1,000,000 additional men with sufficient training to be quickly prepared for active service if called, we would meet practically every reasonable demand.

It is admitted that we can not maintain a standing army of 500,000, or anything near such a number. To obtain a first line of 500,000 a part must constitute the permanent establishment and a part prepared for and subject to immediate call. The proportion which should constitute the permanent peace footing and how the remainder shall be obtained and trained are the subjects of controversy.

The present bill provides a permanent establishment of the Regular Army of 140,000, expansible to 207,000, and an auxiliary force consisting of the National Guard which includes about 130,000 officers and men, expansible to 425,000.

Ex-Secretary Garrison proposed a force of 135,000 regulars and the "Continental Army," to consist of 400,000 men volunteered for duty two months of each year for three years. He would allow the continuance of the National Guard, but without incorporating it into our national forces.

The War College plan is for 281,000 regulars with reserves.

Gen. Wood and some other Army officers advocate a plan of about 250,000 Regulars and 250,000 Volunteers to be prepared for service by intensive training for short periods.

The Chamberlain, or Senate bill, provides for a Regular Army of about 180,000 men, a Volunteer Army of about 250,000 men, and a militia force of about 200,000. All of these plans provide for reserves to meet subsequent demands.

Some matters necessary to be considered in determining the relative merits of these plans will now be discussed.

THE COST.

This bill is not an appropriation bill. It is not an emergency measure. It is not intended to meet the Mexican situation. That has been already provided for by authorizing the enlistment at once of all the men the President has asked for and by extraordinary appropriations. In that regard, as in every other particular instance, Congress must be guided in its action by the administration, and Congress has given instant and unanimous response to every request the President has made.

This bill provides for a permanent peace establishment. The appropriations necessary to carry out its provisions must be considered as a permanent burden on our people. We have and under our present system must continue to maintain the most expensive Army in the world. It costs us to maintain our present Army of less than 100,000 men more than $100,000,000 annually. It will cost us for any contemplated permanent additions to it more than $1,000 per man per year.

Our system of military service is voluntary. That means we induce and do not compel service. For this reason we must pay men more than other nations, which have compulsory service. The European nations do not really pay their soldiers. They give them an allowance of but a few cents per day. Besides, labor is more in demand and receives much higher wages here than in European countries.

To increase our Regular Army to 250,000 men would mean an increase of our Army expenditures to more than $250,000,000 yearly. To increase it to 500,000 men would mean an annual burden of over $500,000,000. These increases would make such increases to our load of national taxation as were never before experienced or even contemplated in time of peace. It would mean more stamp taxes, more revenue taxes, taxes on business, occupations, and professions, inheritance taxes—every conceivable kind of taxes.

It should be remembered that the Army is but one part of our Military Establishment. The Navy is the other and much more expensive part. While we pay $100,000,000 each year to maintain our present Army, it costs us annually $150,000,000 to maintain our Navy. If the President's declared purpose or any policy approaching it is adopted it would increase the annual appropriations for the Navy to from $500,000,000 to $750,000,000. It is true our Army is very small, too small; but it is efficient. The same can not be said of the Navy at present. It is admittedly deficient in both ships and men and it is apparently inefficient. It will cost much more to bring out Navy even up to second place among the navies of the world than it will to adequately strengthen our Army. Not only are new ships of all kinds required, but we shall be compelled to enlist a large number of men to man our enlarged Navy.

To increase and strengthen the Navy is an imperative duty. Unless we expect to send our Army overseas we shall have little difficulty in obtaining and maintaining one amply sufficient for defensive purposes. But with the Navy adequate preparation is still more important. The Navy is our first line of defense. To it we must look primarily for protection against invasion. Increases are demanded for the Navy which must entail a much larger burden of expense than is required for the Army. We must not lose sight of that fact in considering increases authorized for the Army. Both Army and Navy must be considered, and our total military budget should not exceed what can be justified as necessary expenditures at this time for national defense. The people will approve of all necessary additions to present expenditures, but they will expect their Representatives to consider carefully propositions for the appropriation of hundreds of millions of dollars in order to meet the extravagant demands of extremists.

The least that can be expected from this bill when it shall be returned from the Senate and emerge from conference is that it will require an annual expenditure for the Army of over $200,000,000. The least that can be expected from the Navy bill is that it will carry over $300,000,000. This will entail a permanent annual burden of over half a billion dollars for the support of our Army and Navy. This would seem a sufficient increase under existing circumstances.

The plan of increasing the Army proposed in this bill is the least expensive of any suggested, unless a compulsory system is adopted. The Regular Army is skeletonized so that the minimum number only need be paid in times of peace and additions may be made to regiments already officered and formed in times of war. The National Guard will be trained under the direction of Regular Army officers, but in their home towns. They will be paid for time spent in training jointly by the Government and by the States. The Government will not be required either fully to pay or maintain them except when they are called into active service. The reserves will be rapidly increased and will constitute a source of effective defense with little cost to the Government.

In order to secure the number of men required under the other suggested plans, it is proposed to double the pay of the men in the Regular Army, and induce enlistment in the volunteer armies by the payment of bounties from the National Treasury. These plans if adopted would still further increase the cost of maintaining an Army over the estimates already stated.

RECRUITING.

We have already authorized the recruiting of the Army up to the maximum. It is now about 86,700. The War Department is now using extraordinary efforts to recruit the Army up to the standard authorized, about 120,000. Notwithstanding their utmost endeavor, they are only able to recruit about 100 men a day. If this bill passes, to recruit the Army up to the maximum authorized will require 121,000 additional men. To secure these men at the present rate of enlistment would require nearly four years.

It is much easier to enlist men in dull times than in good times. Fifteen dollars per month is very small pay. During the last year, although all the recruiting force was busily engaged in soliciting recruits and more advertising was done than ever before, the Government was only able to secure 45,111 men. This year, with more prosperous conditions, larger demands for labor, and higher wages, enlistments are much slower. It is difficult to induce men to accept a job that pays only 50 cents a day when manufacturing plants are paying from $2 to $4 per day for unskilled laborers.

Men do not joint the Army in time of peace from patriotic motives. Of course if we should become involved in war, conditions would be entirely different. Men then would listen to their country's call, and respond as a duty. But until that time comes we must expect enlistments to be slow. Only about so many men each year, subject to the varying conditions I have referred to, can be induced to enlist. It costs the Government now $180 per man to induce enlistments.

Ex-Secretary Garrison said that 50,000 per year was the limit of enlistments under our present conditions. Gen. McCain, Adjutant General of the Army, said that 50,000 was the maximum that could be enlisted annually. Gen. Wood calls attention to the fact that even for the Spanish War the Government was never able to fill its call, and that never since have we been able to bring our Army up to the authorized strength. He testified that for the year 1915, ending June 30, 27,020 men terminated their enlistments; 3,149 also went out on discharge by purchase.

If we can not fill our Army under present conditions how shall we fill the ranks if the authorized strength is increased to 250,000 or more?

There are two ways in which the number of enlistments can be increased. One, by increasing the pay, we have already referred to. The other is by shortening the term of enlistment.

Under the existing law the term of enlistment is seven years, four years active service and three years reserve. This bill changes the period to three years with the colors and four years with the reserve. Amendments will be presented and I hope adopted so that the term may be shortened, and a soldier who has served one year and obtained a certificate of proficiency and good conduct from his commanding officer can be transferred to the reserve. Gen. Wood has testified that with six months' intensive training a man can be made a good soldier, and that with one year of Regular Army service any man should be qualified for any ordinary military service. Other officers admit that in 12 months a soldier has learned all that is necessary to make him efficient.

The effect of the shorter term will be to induce a larger number of enlistments and to secure a better character of applicants. It will continually pass into the reserve a large number of trained men whom the Government will not be required to support, and who will be ready for immediate service when called to the colors. It would appear not only the best policy but almost necessary if we desire quickly to fill the ranks of any force we shall determine to secure.

CONSCRIPTION.

When the difficulties of securing voluntary enlistments sufficient for the large army demanded, and when the immense cost of maintaining such a large standing army is suggested, our militarist friends necessarily fall back on universal compulsory military service. Such a plan, they say, will secure a sufficient number, and will obviate the necessity of paying the men. Many of them favor the complete adoption of the European system. Many especially praise and applaud the German system. Still more desire us to adopt the Swiss system. This, they declare, will remedy all difficulties about enlistments. It will also solve the problem of how to maintain a large army without great cost, for with compulsory service only a small allowance is given the soldier.

It is astonishing how this proposition, which two years ago would have been considered absurd, is now so widely entertained. The Eastern press very generally approve it. Most of the Army officers desire it. It is advocated by many of the so-called military experts. It has become a formidable cult. It will probably grow stronger as long as the European war continues.

None of the advocates of universal compulsory military service seem disposed to discuss the effect of the adoption of such a system by the United States. Before the present war Germany, with such a system, maintained a standing army on a peace footing of 688,000 men. France maintained an army of 616,000 men.

If the compulsory system in France, with a population of 40,000,000, kept 616,000 men in arms, such a system in the United States would keep 1,500,000 men in arms. Under such universal system the number is determined by the population and the conditions of service. A selective compulsory service is still more difficult of application. No method could be devised by which one man or one class of men would be compelled to serve and another man or class of men relieved of service without injustice and favoritism.

The proposition to create and maintain permanently a large standing army by universal compulsory military service is militarism in its extremest form. It has never before been advocated by men of prominence and standing in this country. It is unwise and dangerous. It is opposed to our principles of democracy. It is not in harmony with our institutions. Never, except in times of war when the Nation is imperiled, have we resorted to force to fill our armies. Except in such cases it can not be justified.

THE NATIONAL GUARD.

This bill makes the National Guard the auxiliary force of our first line of the Army. It would seem apparent that with a military organization already in existence of 129,000 officers and men, well armed and equipped, with at least some training for military service, it would be folly not to utilize and develop this available material. This bill provides a plan by which for the first time in our history the National Guard will be brought under the control of the President and the War Department, so that in time of peace it may be fitted for effective service in time of war. The bill provides for detailing Regular Army officers to train the militia in the discipline prescribed by the Government. The National Guard is made subject to the order of the President for immediate service wherever required when war is declared or is imminent. It can be mobilized at once, because it will be fully armed, equipped, and trained for service. There is a singular prejudice against the use of the militia as a part of our national forces manifested by Regular Army men and some others. It has been strongly urged that the militia can not be amalgamated with the Regular troops as a national force, because to do so would be unconstitutional. There is very slight support for this contention. The militia has been considered from the first both as a State and as a National force. The Constitution recognized its dual nature and obligation. When in the service of the State the Nation need not interfere, and when in the service of the Nation the State can not interfere. Under the express power granted in the Constitution the National Guard may be trained for service, and when it is called into the service of the Nation it will be as much subject to the control of the President as any other part of the national forces.

Another objection urged is that it is composed of "48 little armies," each under a separate commander, and so can not be expected to be an effective force. The bill provides for a uniform system of organization and training, under which there will not be 48 armies, but only 1. The system, in this respect, is like that of the German Army, under which the different German States each furnish their quota under the command of their own officers. The supreme command is given the Emperor there, just as we give supreme command to the President here; and when called to the colors the President can officer them as he chooses, can assign them for duty as he sees fit, and can send them anywhere in the world for service.

The militia of the Nation was never so well officered, so well trained, so effective as it is to-day, and it will be made better under the provisions of this bill.

OTHER FEATURES OF THE BILL.

In judging the increases authorized in this bill the number of men is not the only thing to be considered. Not only is the Regular Army strengthened and enlarged and the militia increased and nationalized, but provision is made for many other things necessary to provide for adequate national defense.

To secure the required number of officers, both for continual service and to provide for emergencies, the number of cadets at West Point will be doubled. The Gard amendment will provide for an appointment of one Regular Army officer for every 400 cadets in military schools, universities, colleges, and other institutions where military training can be imparted. From these a corps of reserve officers of 50,000, who have had 4 years' instruction and 6 months' actual service with the Army is to be created by appointment or selection of the President.

This bill provides for nearly 8,000 officers. There are in the National Guard about 9,000. There are others in the United States available for service, graduates of military schools and others whose military training qualifies them, about 10,000. In all we have now about 27,000 well-trained men, which, with the 50,000 reserve officers provided for, will make a fairly satisfactory number of officers.

To secure an adequate reserve of soldiers of the line it is expected that under the provisions for increases and shorter enlistments 50,000 trained men available for service on the call of the President will be each year added to the reserves. The National Guard, in addition, will each year transfer from active service to the reserves probably 25,000 men who have been trained under governmental supervision. The military schools and colleges and universities where military training is to be given will turn out each year a large number of young men trained for service besides those qualified to act as officers. It will be but a short time until a million or more men trained for service can be quickly called into the field should occasion require.

Provision is also made for summer training schools, on the plan of the Plattsburg camp, where any citizen fit for service can be trained without expense to him by officers of the Regular Army.

It is provided that the department shall at once formulate plans to manufacture at least a large part of its own arms, ammunition, and military equipment.

Provision will also be made for a complete listing of all privately owned plants equipped to manufacture arms and ammunition, so that the Government can take them over in case of need.

The Secretary of War is authorized to procure and have on hand all necessary tools and appliances for the manufacture by the Government of arms, ammunition, and equipment necessary to fully arm and equip our forces in case of war. Provision is also made to increase our reserve stores of arms, ammunition, supplies, and hospital equipment. The Red Cross work is also authorized and encouraged.

The bill provides for organizing the industrial forces of the country so they may be called into service as a necessary element of an adequate national defense and for mobilizing them in case of war.

DENUNCIATION OF THE BILL.

It would be folly to expect that a bill could be framed at this time that would be universally approved. This bill has been denounced on the floor and by the press as weak and insufficient. Yet it provides for larger increases to our Regular Establishment than were ever before made. It presents the most extensive program of preparedness that this country ever considered. It will require the largest increase of military appropriations that we have ever made in time of peace.

After many weeks of deliberation and after hearing the statements and opinions of nearly all the military experts in the country this bill has been placed on the calendar with a unanimous recommendation that it shall pass. Democrats and Republicans on the committee alike approve the bill. It has received the approval of the President. The chairman of the committee [Mr. HAY] said on the floor of the House in presenting the bill:

I am authorized to state by the President of the United States that this bill meets his approval. In other words, it is his bill.

Condemnation of it now by gentlemen who a few days ago were demanding that everyone should "stand by the President" seems hardly justified.

Some additions have been and will be made by amendments. I shall offer an amendment to add a regiment of over 1,900 men, to be recruited in Porto Rico, for service in the Canal Zone, so that two of our regiments serving there can be brought back for service here. Increases ought to be made in the Aviation Corps. The field and machine-gun services should be increased. The Ordnance Department should be considerably strengthened. Other increases are justified, and can be made without destroying the efficiency of the bill and without requiring its recommitment. It should also be remembered that the bill will have to be considered in the Senate, where increases flourish and more lavish habits of expenditure prevail. It is very likely that when it comes back to us it will be almost large enough to meet the wishes of our strenuous advocates for greater increases in the House.

It is unfortunate that some extremists, in their zeal for a tremendous army, greatly exaggerate our condition of unpreparedness. We are not now prepared for war. We never have been. But we are not nearly so weak as some would have the country believe.

It has been said we have no men trained for service who could be called to defend the country if attacked. Gen. Bliss, Assistant Chief of Staff of the Army, was asked to make an estimate of the number of trained men available for service. This is his estimate:

Trained in Regular Army	109,461
Now in Regular Army	68,258
Trained in militia	693,417
Now in militia	129,398
Trained in Spanish-American War	324,302
Graduates from military schools, etc	169,419
Total	1,494,255

It has been said that we have no arms, ammunition, or supplies for an army if we had one. The Chief of Ordnance of the Army says we have supplies on hand fully to equip on an hour's notice 500,000 men.

We have nearly 1,000,000 rifles.

We have 200,000,000 rounds of ammunition for them.

We have under construction 1,077 machine guns.

We have 900 Field Artillery guns and 750,000 rounds of ammunition for them.

The Quartermaster General says we have supplies for 700,000 men on 90 days' notice.

The Chief of Engineers says we can supply trenching tools and pontoon equipment for 500,000 men in 15 days.

The Surgeon General says we have on hand extra medical stores for 250,000 men.

It is certain that the United States is now better prepared fully to arm and equip an army of any size than it ever was before in its history. We are producing within our own borders and from our own resources every form and character of arms, ammunition, and equipment in inconceivable quantities. If we were called upon to do for our own Army what we are now doing for the armies in Europe, we could arm and equip any number of men that might be needed for our own defense.

A REASONABLE POLICY.

There are some very good people who do not favor strengthening our Military Establishment to any extent. They believe all armies bad and any navy unnecessary. These persons would improve or increase neither our Army nor our Navy; they would prefer to abolish both.

There are many others who believe we should at once secure a large standing army and the greatest navy in the world. They believe that our safety requires such action at once, at whatever cost.

A thoughtful, careful, reasonable policy is that desired by the great body of the people. They believe both our Army and our Navy need strengthening. They believe everything necessary to make both efficient should be done. But they do not believe in the policy of maintaining a large army in time of peace. They do not believe we should strive for first place for our Navy among the navies of the world. They do not believe we should go any further than is fairly and reasonably necessary for the protection of our country and the maintenance of its rights and integrity. This bill is formulated on these lines. It is not perfect; but it is difficult to see how any man who believes that something should be done to strengthen our Army can justify himself in opposing it.

Mr. KAHN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I think we are all agreed that it is folly to attempt to maintain in this country a standing army in time of peace that alone and by itself would be altogether sufficient to protect the country against invasion in time of war. I think we are all agreed that the Regular Army, as maintained from year to year in time of peace, should be sufficient for what are loosely called peace purposes—for the training and instruction of the citizen soldiery, for the preservation of law and order, and similar duties and responsibilities—but with an expansive capacity that will enable it to be a nucleus around which the first line of defense is formed in time of war, and that any force we may add to a Regular Army organized for peace purposes that does not make that Regular Army sufficient for war purposes is altogether wasted. I favor the Kahn amendment. My principal objection to the figures that are set in this bill is that I do not believe even the capacity for expansion necessary for war purposes is carried with the small force that is provided to be the strength of the Regular Army. I believe that when an emergency of war confronts us we shall find that, even with our best and most hopeful calculations, the figures we have given will not be enough to take care of the great necessity for the use of the Regular Army for the organization of volunteer forces and all the other tremendous tasks that will confront the country in that time of confusion, excitement, and peril.

Another factor that ought to be taken into consideration in this connection, I believe, even though we were simply regarding the proposition as one contemplating the maintenance of the Regular Army in time of peace, is the enormous geographical area that must be garrisoned by troops and in which law and order must be maintained.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman from Virginia use some of his time?

Mr. HAY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the bill as it comes before the House presents the combined best judgment of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs. It does not present exactly my idea of what the Regular Army should consist of. I believe we should have a larger Regular Establishment; but the limit of 140,000 in time of peace and 207,000 in time of war represents the mature judgment of the majority of the membership of that committee as to the proper size of an Army which this country should have in time of peace. In setting the figure for our Regular Army, we must bear in mind that it should not be set at the figure to which it should be increased in time of war: but our Regular Army should be a peace Army, of the size that we expect to maintain in time of peace. In time of war or should this country ever be menaced as some gentlemen thing it might be, the Regular Army would be a drop in the bucket; we would have to rely on the volunteer and civilian forces that have always responded and saved the country in time of national danger. The mere increase of the Regular Establishment by forty or fifty thousand additional men now will not provide the necessary men to form an Army of the size that would be needed at such a time.

Another obstacle to enlarging the Army further than the committee has recommended is the great expense and cost of it, for on an increase of the Army in time of peace to 220,000 men, you are going to increase the expense from $103,000,000, as it is at the present time, to approximately $220,000,000 per annum. Another thing, The Adjutant General told our committee that in time of peace it was only possible to recruit about 55,000 men each year for the Regular Establishment. If we reduce the limit of the enlistment, as we do in this bill to three years, it can readily be seen that recruiting 65,000 men each year will tax the miximum resources of enlistment to maintain an Army of 150,000 men in time of peace. If we increase it to 220,000 or 300,000 men, it means as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] has well said, compulsory service, and I do not believe the country is as yet ready to go to that basis. Therefore I believe it would be far wiser to adhere to the figures that the Military Committee has set. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is it not a fact that the bill proposes to increase the present establishment two-fifths, while the amendment of the gentleman from California would increase it six-fifths, or one-fifth more than double?

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman's statement is, I think, correct. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I want to add a word to what has been said by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] and other gentlemen who have spoken on the amendment of the gentleman from California. I do not believe that the amendment should be adopted. I believe the bill as it has been presented is a fair and reasonable one. There is one thing we have to consider in connection with this bill, and that is that it is not such an easy matter in time of peace to get young men of worth who will enlist in the Army. If war comes, of course, you can get men to enlist, but when it is a time of peace it is a very difficult matter. There is a just reason and a just cause for young men of character and worth refusing to enlist in the Army in the time of peace. The fact is that there is no great inducement for them to do so, when you take into consideration the treatment they receive at the hands of the Government and the people when they have been discharged honorably from the service.

Proper regard and consideration for men who have served and will serve in the armies and the navies of this country should be exhibited at all times, and I think it is the duty of the Government to give preference to men who have honorably served their country in the Army and the Navy when it comes to employment in the civil service. Let there be more respect by law, if need be, for the uniform of our soldiers and sailors, and let none of them be denied admission to places of amusement because of same, as has often been the case. Let the Government and the American people show more consideration for the men who have served this country in giving them employment in civil life. I think an honorable discharge given to a soldier or sailor should be considered by the Government and the people as a badge of honor and a recommendation of the highest order. Yet this is not so to-day, and very few of those who have served their country faithfully and honestly have been shown any preference whatever.

There are men to-day who have taken the civil-service examination and who, by reason of having been disabled in the service, are entitled under existing law to preference in the civil-service appointments. Yet but a few of them get upon the rolls by reason of this statute. The Civil Service Commission sends their names to the appointive powers with two others, and it is the common practice, from my experience and examination of numerous instances, that where there are three names sent to the appointing power for appointment to the civil service, and where one of them is discharged from the Army for disability in the line of duty, and thereby having preference under the law, and in addition certified as being capable and able to perform the duties of the position which he seeks, the appointive powers in seventy-five cases out of eighty turn down the soldiers who have been discharged for disability in line of duty and take one of the other men. That is so to-day in the Post Office Department of the Government, and so in other branches of the Government, and has been so not only in this administration but in other administrations. Until the Government of the United States shows some appreciation of the young men who will go out to serve their country in the Regular Army, who will go to Mexico or elsewhere, who get injured and return and are discharged because of disability—until they receive just and due consideration, it will not be an easy matter to enlist them. As it is to-day the law on the statute book is in substance violated to favor those who have political influence. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to differ with my good friend from Missouri [Mr. DYER] in his ideas concerning the size of our Army, inasmuch as he is at the head of that splendid organization known as the United Spanish War Veterans. I want to say, however, that I shall vote for an army of 220,000 men, and I would gladly vote for an army of 250,000 men, because I do not regard an army of 250,000 as any menace to this country. Our Army is composed of our young men and boys who go into the Army for a short period and then go back to civil life, and for us to hold up the specter of militarism by reason of an army of 250,000 composed of such men is utterly foolish.

We have been told that 140,000 is about all we can get; but I am willing at this time that we shall make the attempt, for two reasons. In the first place, unless we increase the Army the emergency in Mexico may assume proportions necessitating calling out the volunteer soldiers. During this period it will be easy to get men who are anxious and willing to go into the service, and thus avoid calling on the National Guard until it shall have had a chance to demonstrate what can be done for it under the plan as proposed.

You well know my confidence in the National Guard, but I want to legislate in such a way that during this period of great emergency we shall do everything we can to avoid the necessity of calling the volunteer soldier into the field, because I realize what it means; the sundering of home ties, the interruption of business affairs, which are always caused by sending a volunteer army into the field.

For these reasons, namely, because it is possible now to get men willing to do this service, and in order to prevent our volunteer forces being called into the field until they are better armed and equipped, I am glad to vote for an army which in some measure represents the true dignity and worth of this great Nation of ours. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is peculiarly and curiously illogical and indefensible. I realize that there are a good many men on this floor who believe that we should have a larger number of units in the Regular Army than are provided for by this bill, and I had supposed that as we reached the portions of the bill relating to the size and number of units amendments would be offered increasing them. In regard to such amendments, there would have been ground for difference of opinion. Some have thought that an increase of the Coast Artillery companies was proper and necessary; some believe, no doubt, that an increase of the regiments of Cavalry is desirable; some that a larger number of Infantry regiments should be provided; the importance of Field Artillery has been demonstrated by the European war, and there are, no doubt, some who believe it might be well to increase the number of field batteries above the number provided by the bill; but those various items were passed over. It is not proposed to add to the number of units in any branch of the service by this amendment. The adoption of the amendment would not accomplish the result of giving us in time of actual war a larger Regular Establishment than we would have under the bill as it now stands. It would simply result in taking from the establishment we are providing for its all important element of expansibility. The amendment would, however, load on the people of the country an additional expenditure of from seventy to eighty million dollars annually for a larger force in time of peace, and I suggest to the gentleman that it would be well to think of that now and not wait until we are called upon to vote additional taxes. We would load upon the people of the country an additional burden of seventy to eighty million dollars every year without securing either a larger or a better establishment when actually needed than is provided for by the bill.

If gentlemen who believe in a larger Regular Establishment than the bill provides for have the courage of their convictions, or had them when we passed over the former sections of the bill, they should have voted for increases in the units of Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery as we came to them, in order that the Regular Establishment might be, when expanded, in time of need a larger force than is provided by this bill. This bill represents, as I understand it, the average judgment of the committee, and I regret exceedingly that the members of the committee, who came so nearly to an agreement, could not have seen their way clear to stand by the work of the committee as presented to the House. I propose to vote for this bill, or at least most of its features, not because I approve of all its items and all of its provisions, but because it does represent a reasonable expansion of the Regular Establishment, probably as large an expansion as we can secure in time of peace through voluntary enlistments. [Applause.] Any considerable increases above the number we provided for can, in the opinion of the recruiting officers of the Army, only be secured in time of peace by conscription. We do not propose to go to that.

The bill as it stands increases the Regular Army by 10 regiments of Infantry; 6 regiments of Field Artillery; 52 companies, or the approximation of 6 regiments, of Coast Artillery; 15 companies of Engineers; and 4 aero squads. This is an increase on a peace basis of 40,000 men and approximately 7,500 officers. Without any change of organization whatever, the units provided for in the bill can be readily and quickly expanded by the addition of enlisted men to a force of over 200,000.

The increase which the bill provides on a peace footing will, when fully organized, increase the cost of the Regular Army about $50,000,000 annually, and adding to this the $11,000,000 estimated as the increase of militia pay, provided in the bill, we would have a total increased cost for our Military Establishment, when this new organization is in full swing, of over $50,000,000 annually.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] would not, as I have said, give us a single additional company or regiment in any arm of the service. It would simply have the effect, if appropriations were made to carry it out, of expanding the establishment which we are providing for in the bill to full war strength in time of peace, leaving no room for expansion in time of war, and it would increase the cost by from seventy to eighty million dollars annually. I do not feel justified in voting to do that.

I feel that in providing for an Army of approximately 150,000 men, including officers, in time of peace, for nearly 800 officers in excess of those needed with troops to train the militia and students in schools and colleges, in providing for pay for the militia which should give us approximately 200,000 men in that line of the service, in providing for cadet corps, officers' training corps, and reserve corps of both officers and men, and in providing for the Federal control and prompt mobilization of these forces as well as for the industrial establishments of the country, we have a measure which presents about as good a scheme of preparedness as we can secure under voluntary enlistments and at a cost which the people will be willing to pay.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, there is an old adage that when doctors fall out the layman has a right to speak. I trust, therefore, I shall not be deemed presumptuous in volunteering to express an opinion upon this very important question. There is no intrinsic merit in mere numbers. The fate of the Nation is not going to hinge on the proposition of whether the Army contains 140,000 men or 220,000 men. We all know that in the end the safety of the country must depend upon the courage and patriotism of the people themselves. Some of the experts say one thing and some say another; but as respects the question of mere numbers of the standing Army, their differences are not irreconcilable nor fundamental. In saying this I am not unmindful of the wide divergence between the advice offered by the heroic gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], who in time of emergency would have none but Regulars on guard, and that offered by the less belligerent gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], who would discard all material physic for the body politic and trust to faith alone to cure all the ills of the flesh. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that every official of the Government charged with responsibility upon the subject, from the President to your committee, is agreed upon the proposition that there should be some increase in the standing army. The only question left to us to decide is how much. The President in his message said the Army should consist of about 140,000 men—I forget the exact figures. The former Secretary of War, Mr. Garrison, in his able annual report, said the same thing. The General in Chief of the Army says 150,000 is about the right number, and your committee recommends 140,000. The Army War College says 260,000, leaving out the Philippine scouts, and the gallant gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] now says 220,000. I wonder what has happened to the gentleman since he agreed to the committee report.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The committee agreed absolutely on principle. There was not a division of opinion, but the gentlemen of the committee reserved the right to offer amendments to perfect the bill with regard to details, especially as to this increase.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. I am not criticizing the gentleman's motives nor his rights. I must say, however, that the course pursued by some members of the committee in this case respecting the work of their own hands is most unusual. The gentleman from California, after his arduous service on the committee, when he had seen the work of his hands and pronounced it good, retired into solitude to rest. Deep sleep fell upon him, and he dreamed a dream, and a vision of the future rose before him. He thought he saw the stranger from the isles of Nippon peeping with covetous eyes through the Golden Gate upon the fruits and flowers of the Pacific slope, and his heart quaked and he was afraid.

When he awoke he resolved forthwith to strengthen his prescription and give the country 220,000 instead of 140,000 ounces of "national preparedness."

But, jesting aside, which of these estimates is correct?

With considerable confidence, I should say the report of the committee is right, because—

First. According to the statement of the War Department, 140,000 represents about the maximum number of men we shall be able to recruit for the Army under present conditions. If we want more, we shall have to pay much higher wages or conscript the men; and we would not be justified at this time in doing either of these things.

Second. If we augmented the number beyond what is provided for in the bill we would have nowhere to house them. New land sites would have to be acquired, new posts established, new barracks and quarters constructed at great and unnecessary expense to the people. According to the estimate of the department, the present accommodations would be sufficient to supply only some 140,000 men.

Third. If the number of the Army should be increased as proposed in this amendment, in time of peace there would be nothing for the additional 80,000 men to do.

According to the calculations of the department, the 140,000 men provided for in the bill will be amply sufficient to preserve the peace and execute the laws of the country, to garrison the military posts at home and abroad, to defend the frontiers, to train and instruct our citizen soldiery—in short, to perform all the duties for which an army is designed short of making war on a large scale.

Fourth. The increase called for in the committee bill is in line with the precedent followed by the Government on similar occasions in the past, and violates no traditional policy of the country.

It may be interesting to recall that the question of what was the proper size for the Army in a free Republic in time of peace was one of the first with which the administration of Washington had to deal. In 1792 he sent to Congress and obtained its approval for a bill organizing the Army upon a peace footing of 5,120 men. The population of the country at that time was 3,929,214. So it will be seen that Washington's plan contemplated 1 soldier in the Army for every 767 people.

When the great War between the States had closed and the question again recurred what size Army should be maintained for the future, by act of Congress, July, 1866, the number was fixed at 50,000. Estimating the population at that period at 33,000,000, we shall see that this contemplated 1 soldier for every 660 persons of the civil population.

Conjecturing the population at present to be about 100,000,000, an Army of 140,000 would represent 1 soldier for every 714 persons in civil life—a figure about on a par with that fixed by Washington at the beginning of the Republic and that fixed later by Congress at the close of the Civil War.

Now, on the contrary, the increase called for by this amendment, if adopted, would mean 1 soldier for every 454 people in the United States—a greater number than has ever been maintained by this Government in time of peace in all the years of its history.

Mr. Chairman, the bill before us increases the standing Army by 40 per cent, which, in my view, is a very substantial addition to the Nation's defense. We are not living in ordinary times, and thoughtful men all over the country believe we should take some steps toward putting our house in order. The committee bill is a fair and reasonable response to the public demand. The cost has been guarded, it seems to me, with wise care, and the increased expense will not, in my judgment, be an unwelcome burden upon the Public Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, if I had the time I would allow the gentleman time in which to finish the dream. [Laughter.] I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, it seems almost superfluous for the President of the United States to go all over the country and by his presence exhibit the existing sentiment for preparedness and after all have it all result in the mountain being in labor and bringing forth a ridiculous mouse. Forty thousand men—that is all—to be added to the Regular Army!

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not true that in its present form this bill is a joke, and is it not also true that in its present form such strong "peace-at-any-price" advocates as William Jennings Bryan, Henry Ford, and Jane Addams could all vote for this bill if they were Members of this House?

Mr. GARDNER. I will say to my fellow Member and Spanish War veteran, that of course he is right. Why, not only could those pacifists vote for this bill but all the people of this House who for years have been fighting against a large army can and will vote for this bill. For instance, I hold in my hand a list of the Committee on Military Affairs who have agreed on this bill, if you please. They have agreed on this bill unanimously, and now let us see who they are and how they have stood on national defense before the present time. On that committee there are just 10 men who were in the last Congress. Let us see which were little Navy men and which were big Navy men.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Army men.

Mr. GARDNER. No; I say, "Navy," because we had no record vote on the Army, and their vote are illustrative of whether or not they were, at heart, on the pacifist side or on the increase side. JAMES HAY, chairman, did not vote. S. HUBERT DENT, Jr., voted on the little Navy side. WILLIAM J. FIELDS voted on the little Navy side. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR voted on the little Navy side. PERCY E. QUIN voted on the little Navy side. WILLIAM GORDON voted on the little Navy side. DANIEL R. ANTHONY, Jr., did not vote. JULIUS KAHN voted on the big Navy side. FRANK L. GREENE voted on the big Navy side. JOHN C. MCKENZIE voted on the big Navy side. It shows, Mr. Chairman, that this is a bargain, a simple surrender. They have given out to the world, they have said we want real preparedness, and we get 40,000 men. Now, what are 40,000 men? I hold in my hand a list of the standing armies of the various countries of the world before the outbreak of the European war. I find the standing army of Turkey is no less than 430,000 men, just three times as big. I find the standing army of Switzerland, little Switzerland, with 140,000 men, and after these months and months and months of telling the country about the preparedness we are going to have, this is the net result. I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. How much time did the gentleman yield back?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back six minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, this bill that we have been considering for the past day or two, which will be known as the Hay military bill, in my judgment, can not be completely satisfactory to any but the extreme pacifist. It may be, in a measure, satisfactory to the conservative preparedness advocate, but I am certain that I express the feeling of a large percentage of the number of red-blooded men in this country when I say that it is not what they had reason to expect, and do expect, from this Congress.

I believe that I reasonably represent the business element of this great country, being connected, as I am, with various industries employing many hundreds of men and women in various sections of the country, but more particularly in the very prosperous district which I have the honor to represent, I believe that I know what the people in that locality expect in this direction, and demand. It is, from my standpoint, absurd to offer this country, as adequate protection against invasion on either one shore of this great country or the other, an increase in the standing Army of this country of only 40,000 men above the legal number provided for to-day.

It is true that in this country in the past 12 months the guns, ammunition, clothing, and every other item that goes to the matter of equipping an army have increased in manufacture and production perhaps in the neighborhood of 1,000 per cent, so that in this direction this country is in a position to defend itself promptly. I know whereof I speak, because in my own district we have in the past 12 months developed industries in this direction that have increased their capacity to the extent that I have named a moment ago.

We have in the city of Utica what was the Savage Arms Co. Twelve months ago this concern was manufacturing sporting rifles and pistols. To-day the concern is known as the Driggs-Seabury Co., and they are turning out at the present time approximately 50 Lewis rapid-fire guns per day. One year ago to-day this plant was turning out nothing but spotting rifles and pistols, as I have said.

A year ago last November, in the village of Ilion, where there had been for nearly 100 years previous to that a plant known as the Remington Arms Co., who were manufacturing at that time perhaps five or six hundred rifles a day for the various armies of the world, and about the same number of sporting guns, are to-day—less than 18 months from the time the property was bought to increase the capacity of that plant—turning out approximately 3,000 Lee-Enfield rifles a day. This is an evidence of what this country can do when the demand comes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the only thing that we need in this country at the present time, in addition to what we have, is a sufficient number of men in our standing Army to make the people of this country—the farmer, the man in the mine, the man in the factory, the small-business man, the large-business man, the banker, the preacher—feel altogether secure in their positions and in their rights, so that they can hold up their heads and walk the streets and the avenues of this great country of ours, and in any part of the world, feeling that no whit of their dignity or self-respect shall be taken from them by the necessity and the humiliation of knowing that we have not got the strength of backing up promptly the suggestions and demands of our State and executive departments in their negotiations with other great countries in the world, and, therefore, Mr. Chairman, I favor the Kahn resolution increasing the Army to 220,000 men. I would favor even a greater number of men than that, believing that fully 80 per cent of the taxpayers, directly and indirectly, in this country believe that we should have an Army of that magnitude, sufficient, as I have said before, to repel invasion on either shore of this great country, or on both shores at the same time. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] such time as he desires.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, the army proposed by the committee bill is sufficient for this country in time of peace. In the event of war it will answer as a skeleton upon which an army can be built up. If gentlemen are desirous of an army in this country in time of peace that will keep the country ready for war, the bill proposed by the committee is not sufficient, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] does not provide half enough. The amendment should provide for 1,500,000 to 2,000,000 men instead of 220,000.

We must discriminate between our country on a peace basis and our country on a war basis. Is there necessity at this time for placing the country on a war basis? So far as I am concerned, I believe that at this time it would answer every purpose of our country to bring our coast defenses up to a high state of efficiency with the latest and the best of armament and provide the means for getting from one station to the other with sufficient equipment, ammunition, and men to take care of an invading army in case it should undertake to land anywhere in our country.

Mr. HELVERING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will.

Mr. HELVERING. As a matter of fact, the bill carries the recommendation of the Lieutenant General of the Army, does it not?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand it does.

Mr. HELVERING. Gen. Miles recommended 140,000, or possibly 150,000 men.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; and that, of course, was with the idea we were at peace to-day and would continue at peace. I am assuming we are at peace, though our Army is on foreign soil on a punitive expedition. No man knows what the result of the next 10 days may be or the next 2 weeks. We shall meet that condition if it arises.

Mr. Chairman, I can not support the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. I am opposed to a large standing army in time of peace.

Mr. Chairman, of course, while war continues to be the final arbiter between nations every nation must be prepared for that direful eventuality, so what I am about to say to-day is aside from the question of proper preparation for national defense against an invading foe.

It is proper to say, Mr. Chairman, that wars are not accidents, like fires, nor incidents of nature, like earthquakes and floods. Wars are declared by the authorized authorities of nations for the purpose of asserting an alleged national right or avenging an alleged national wrong.

When a serious dispute arises between nations, war is instinctively thought to be the only arbiter that will do honor to the nations involved, A just solution of questions of difference can not now be secured in a final decision by a duly constituted authority as a matter of national right. A metallic ring is therefore given to diplomatic notes to arouse national pride. Inferior diplomacy and weak international statesmanship soon call for an inventory of battleships, submarines, mines, aeroplanes, ammunition, and all manner of implements and agents of death and destruction, and if these instruments of power are deemed sufficient, the final diplomatic notes are on the one hand an ultimatum and on the other hand a defiance.

The question at issue is then submitted to the arbitrament of cruel war, where power instead of justice decides the questions of difference between nations.

Mr. Chairman, this has been the accepted method of reaching a final decision on serious international questions through all the centuries, and the decisions have been secured by the nations that have had the most powerful implements of war with well-trained men. With war as the arbiter, that nation is not "thrice armed that hath its quarrel just," but that has the best implements of war and destruction.

War's conception of justice, right, and honor is the possession of power to cause destruction to the life and property of the foe.

Before I go further into the matter let me read a letter from a man who has recently seen modern warfare in process of settling an international dispute. He says:

Your letter was here when I arrived home from the Dardanelles. I have been out there since the beginning.

I saw more men blown up in one hour out there than I saw killed all through the Boer War.

After we landed our troops on April 25 we were turned into a distributing hospital ship. Over 20,000 wounded passed through our vessel. It fell to my lot to sew up and bury the dead. To see the flower of the youth of Britain, Australia, and New Zealand—and Turkey, too, for that matter—mangled and maimed beyond recognition; not a man over 35 years and not one under 19 years; * * * to see lines of men charging with shrapnel blowing big gaps in their lines, makes one wonder if there is a living God who looks down and allows such things to go on.

April 25 will stand out as the day of horrors in my life. I suppose the landing against such odds was one of the finest things in history. Some poor chaps never got ashore. Boatload after boatload of troops grounded on the barbed-wire entanglements which stretched from the shore under the water for 30 feet, and not a man in them was left alive. They floated away later, filled to the gunwales with their dead.

On shore the sight was worse. So congested were the Turks in their trenches on such small land space that every 12-inch or 6-inch shell simply sent heads, legs, arms, and trunks of bodies flying in all directions. I think there must have been at least 50 heavy men-of-war—British and French—as well as torpedo-boat destroyers as thick as gnats, banging away all day and all night without a stop. From the giant Queen Elizabeth down every ship was searching the Turkish trenches with guns of all calibers. Above aeroplanes were spotting and bomb dropping. Every living person in a circle of 20 miles was bent on taking life or mangling some other person. This carnage was between men who had never exchanged a cross word; who had never even seen one another.

Mr. Chairman, it does not seem possible that this letter could have been written in an age and country where there is boast of culture and civilization, but it was, and the more than 12,000,000 of men who are either missing or are prisoners or are wounded or are dead, the $50,000,000,000 that have been worse than wasted, the untold billions of dollars' worth of property that has been destroyed in the last 20 months in Europe all testify that civilized nations still resort to barbarous war when international questions arise; and, Mr. Speaker, it may as well be conceded that war, with all its barbarity and cruelty and inhumanity, will continue to be the international arbiter until the nations of the world find some means of guaranteeing the integrity, the security, and equal honor to all nations upon all international questions.

Mr. Chairman, it is an unspeakable calamity to the people of the world that the public mind in all generations has been taught and trained to think of war as the final arbiter of international disputes. Even in this enlightened age and in our own beloved Christian country there is to-day a general assumption that there are international questions that can have no other honorable solution than by the arbitrament of war. We are to-day bound by a weird sort of worship of the punctilios in international relations, in which the formality finally calls for a show of force and arms, in which when the curtain falls on diplomacy it instantly rises on war. The war drums beat, there is an appeal to national pride, and patriotic people yield to the war spirit. To-day and for months past those in charge of our diplomacy are making demands for armed force on land and sea to an extent that little else has filled the public press or agitated the public mind, and Congress is responding to the demand for a larger Army and a larger Navy.

Is there no other honorable way of settling disputes between nations? To say there is not is to say that civilization and statesmanship have failed. The crucible of war now consuming Europe should produce something for humanity besides larger armies and navies and more destructive implements of war.

Mr. Chairman, it may be well that while all of the nations resort to war that we also shall have our arms instantly ready and our powder constantly dry for emergencies that may arise. But at the same time this government of the people, for the people, and by the people should ask the nations of the earth to unite with it in establishing other means than war for the security of national honor and for the maintenance of national integrity.

Mr. Chairman, until a few years ago dueling was looked upon as the only honorable means of settling differences between individuals. It has taken most of the time men have lived on the earth to develop political systems under which small communities are not constantly at war with each other. Happily for the world, now dueling is generally as unlawful as murder, and differences between the smaller political subdivisions of States and nations are no longer settled by force of arms. Law has been made the arbiter in disputes of this kind.

Now, let me cite some notable federations that have abolished war between their people. The Swiss Federation, made up of independent States; the French Republic, made up of independent States; the German Empire, made up of independent States. All of these States, before entering the federations of which they are now a part, were almost constantly at war with one another. Their differences are now adjusted by the orderly processes of the law, with equal honor and justice to all.

The United States of America, of Colombia, of Argentina, of Bolivia, of Brazil, and of Chile have each united many independent States that otherwise might be constantly at war with each other. These federations in Europe and America have promoted the general welfare of their people and have established a general peace between the political subdivisions of which the nations are composed and enabled their people to enjoy tranquillity with neighboring States and to engage in the pursuit of happiness, marred only by the fear of international disturbances.

International commerce, travel, intercourse, and communication are more general and more important than ever before. The people of the world live in closer relationship to each other. Conversation may be carried on between people in remote parts of the earth and instant communication sent everywhere on the globe where civilization has carried its triumphs.

Mr. Chairman, has not God given man this conquest of the earth to enable him to "furl his battle flags in the parliament of man, the federation of the world"?

I believe the nations of the earth can do for themselves that which the political subdivisions of which they are composed have done for themselves—establish international justice, insure international tranquillity, provide national security, and promote the general welfare under an international federation and constitution, and I fear these ends can not be attained in any other way.

All questions within every nation between individuals and the political subdivisions are to-day adjusted by laws enacted and enforced under constitutions the political subdivisions and nations agreed upon as the law under which they live in honorable security.

An international constitution, therefore, may be, and I believe should be, adopted by a federation of the world to enact and enforce international law and to vouchsafe to all nations, great and small, national security, national honor, national integrity, and to the world international tranquillity.

Mr. Chairman, is this an idle dream? It has not been so in Switzerland between former warring States; it has not been so in France between former warring States; it has not been so in Germany between former warring States. One of the chief purposes of the fathers of the Republic in forming the United States of America under a Constitution was to "insure domestic tranquillity." The same purpose was the prime cause for the formation of the Central and South American Republics. The avowed purpose of Pan Americanism, so recently hailed as a new American doctrine and a new international policy for all the Governments of the Western Hemisphere, is but the logical development of a great governmental principle—to establish international tranquillity and promote the general welfare.

The idea of securing the protection of government under federal law is as old as the desire for national security. This was the purpose of the Amphictyonic Council, 1,100 years before Christ; of the Achæan League, 300 years before Christ; of the Hanseatic League, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; and of the League of the Rhine a few years later. These are but some of the early efforts to establish governmental security under international law. The results in every case were worthy of the efforts made.

Federations with authority to enact and enforce laws between nations have been suggested by political writers and statesmen. A score of the greatest publicists in Germany, among them Kant, have urged formal international action in the enactment and enforcement of international law. French publicists have taken the same position, among them St. Pierre. This was the idea of the Brussels Congress in 1848, when it resolved:

That the speedy convocation of a congress of nations, composed of duly appointed representatives, for the purpose of framing a well-digested and authoritative international code, is of the greatest importance, inasmuch as the organization of such a body and the unanimous adoption of such a code would be on other occasions an effectual means of promoting universal peace.

This purpose has inspired men in parliamentary bodies to take steps for the creation of such an international federation. In 1848 Arnold Ruge offered a resolution in the German Parliament at Frankfort that declared:

We therefore recognize the necessity of calling into existence a congress of nations for the purpose of effecting a general disarmament of Europe.

In 1849, M. Bouvet, in the National Assembly of France, submitted the following in a resolution:

The French Republic proposes to the Governments and representative assemblies of the different States of Europe, America, and other civilized countries to unite, by their representatives, in a congress which shall have for its object a proportional disarmament among the powers and abolition of war, and a substitution for the barbarous usage an arbitral jurisdiction, of which the said congress shall immediately fulfill the functions.

About the same time Mr. Cobden, in the British Parliament, offered the following resolution:

That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she shall be graciously pleased to direct her principal secretary of state for foreign affairs to enter into communication with foreign powers inviting them to concur in treaties binding the respective parties, in the event of future misunderstandings which can not be arranged by amicable negotiation, to refer the matter in dispute to the decision of arbitrators.

Mr. Tuck, of Pennsylvania, in the House of Representatives, on January 16, 1849, submitted a resolution in which he proposed—

That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing a correspondence to be opened by the Secretary of State with foreign Governments on the subject of procuring treaty stipulations for the reference of all future disputes to a friendly arbitration, or for the establishment instead thereof of a congress of nations to determine international law and settle international disputes.

The conferences at The Hague and of the Inter-Parliamentary Union in recent years have been inspired by the hope that a way might be agreed upon to settle international disputes without resorting to war.

Former President Taft and former Secretary of State Mr. Root have lately suggested the complete breaking down of international law and the necessity for its orderly reestablishment, with provisions for its enactment.

Mr. Chairman, international law, such as it has been, has failed and is failing to-day to redress national wrongs in both hemispheres. Wrongs ranging from the confiscation and destruction of property to the murder of men, women, and children are of frequent occurrence. A state of international lawlessness and anarchy exists. There is now no authority in international affairs except force, which does not know the limitations of law and results in international anarchy and destruction. International relations with resulting differences must continue. These relations and interests amount in large measure to interdependence, and are more intimate to-day than ever before in the history of the world. Individual nations can not make and enforce international law. That was the dream of Cæsar, of Napoleon, and is the dream of William. It has never been, and ought not to be, within the power of any nation to make and enforce laws for all nations.

How, then, shall nations adjust their differences? Civilization and statesmanship must not confess failure to meet the necessities and reasonable expectations of mankind. An orderly and effective rule of international law must be established. This can only be done under an international constitution creating, with proper formality and by the united action of the nation, a legislative, executive, and judicial authority in an international federation.

Mr. Chairman, to accomplish that great end I offer the following joint resolution and tentative constitution, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

Joint resolution proposing the establishment of the international federation of the world.

Resolved, etc., That the Government of the United States of America believes the progress of the world in the arts, sciences, commerce, and communication that now bring the people of the world in close relationship make it not only wise but necessary to the common welfare that international relations shall be controlled by international law enacted and enforced by authority, so that honor, security, integrity, and tranquillity shall be vouchsafed to all nations;

That the Government of the United States of America therefore adopts the following constitution, which is made a part of this resolution, for an international federation of the world to accomplish this high purpose as therein set forth; and

That the Secretary of State of the United States of America, by direction of the President, shall send copies of this resolution and the proposed constitution for an international federation of the world to the foreign offices of the several nations of the world, to be by the executive authorities of such Governments, at their pleasure, laid before their legislative assemblies for consideration and adoption.

CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL FEDERATION OF THE WORLD.

The Governments of the world, in order to form an international federation, establish international justice, insure international tranquillity, provide national security, and promote the general welfare, do ordain and establish this constitution for the international federation of the world.

SECTION 1. All international legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in the international congress of the world, which shall consist of a senate and house.

SEC. 2. The house shall be composed of 225 members, apportioned among the nations according to their voting populations, by the average of the total vote for members of the lower branches of the national assemblies in the three elections immediately preceding the adoption of this constitution, and chosen every sixth year by the most popular branch of the national legislatures of the several nations represented in the federation.

No person shall be a representative who shall not have attained the age of 25 years and been 12 years a citizen of the nation he is chosen to represent, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the nation in which he shall be chosen.

When vacancies occur in the representation of any nation the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies by the body from which the vacancy occurs.

The house shall choose a speaker and other officers and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

SEC. 3. The senate of the international federation of the world shall be composed of 96 senators, apportioned among the nations according to their international commerce, to be ascertained by the average of such commerce for a six years' period immediately preceding the establishment of this constitution.

The international senators shall be chosen by the upper branch of the national legislatures of the several nations for a period of 12 years.

Immediately after they have been assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the fourth year, of the second class at the expiration of the eighth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the twelfth year, so that one-third may be chosen every fourth year; and if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any nation, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the upper branch of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 35 years and been 15 years a citizen of the nation he is chosen to represent, and who shall not when elected be an inhabitant of that nation for which he shall be chosen.

The vice president of the international federation of the world shall be president of the senate, but shall have no vote unless the senate be equally divided on a vote. The vice president shall in that case cast the deciding vote.

The senate shall chose its other officers and also a president pro tempore, who shall preside in the absence of the vice president or when the vice president shall exercise the office of president of the international federation of the world.

The senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the president of the international federation of the world is tried, the chief justice of the international federation shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

Judgment in case of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the international federation of the world.

SEC. 4. The times and manner of electing senators and representatives of the international federation of the world shall be prescribed in each nation by the legislature thereof.

The congress shall assemble at least once in every year and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in October.

SEC. 5. Each branch of the international congress shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each branch shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each branch may provide.

Each branch of the international congress may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

Each branch of the international congress shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same; and the yeas and nays of the members of either branch on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal.

Neither branch, during the session of the international congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, not to any other place than that in which the two branches shall be sitting.

SEC. 6. The senators and members of the house shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by the international congress of the world and be paid out of the treasury of the international federation of the world.

The members of both branches of the international congress of the world shall, in all cases except felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective branches and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either body the senators and representatives of the international congress shall not be questioned in any other place.

No member of either branch of the international congress of the world shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the international federation of the world, which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the international federation of the world shall be a member of either body during his continuance in office.

SEC. 7. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the house, but the senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills.

Every bill which shall have passed the house and senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the president of the international federation of the world. If he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the branch of the international congress in which it shall have originated, which shall enter the objections at large on their journal and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of the branch shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other branch, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that branch it shall become an international law. But in all such cases the votes of both branches shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journal of each branch, respectively.

If any bill shall not be returned by the president within 20 days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be an international law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the congress, by their adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the senate and house may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the president of the international federation, and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the senate and house according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

SEC. 8. The congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes and excises, apportioned to the nations composing the federation, one-half according to the population, to be ascertained by the last preceding enumeration of the populations of the several nations, and one-half according to international commerce, to be ascertained by the average of such commerce for six years next prior to the laying of the tax, and such tax so levied shall be paid into the treasury of the international federation; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the international federation; to borrow money on the credit of the international federation; to regulate the carriers of international commerce and the paths of international commerce on the seas; to fix a uniform standard of weights and measures and of money; to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries, which shall be uniform in all nations; to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and offenses against the international federation of the world; to raise and support such martial force for use on land and sea as may be necessary to enforce the international law and the decrees of the international court and to suppress insurrections against the authority of the international federation; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and sea forces; to provide for calling out the land and sea forces to execute the laws of the international federation; to adopt an official language and provide for the publication of its proceedings and enactments in each nation in its own language; to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over the island of Porto Rico, which shall become the seat of government of the international federation of the world; to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the international federation of the world or in any department or office thereof.

SEC. 9. No preference shall be given by any regulation of the carriers of international commerce to the carriers of one nation over those of another.

No money shall be drawn from the international treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and a regular statement and account of all the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

No title of nobility shall be granted by the international federation, and no person holding any office of profit or trust under the federation shall without the consent of the congress accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever from any nation or ruler whatsoever.

SEC. 10. No nation shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or other federation, nor grant letters of marque and reprisal.

No nation shall, without the consent of the international congress, keep ships of war, or engage in war, unless actually invaded or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE 2.

SECTION 1. The executive power shall be vested in a president of the international federation of the world. He shall hold office during a term of 12 years, and, together with the vice president, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows:

The two branches composing the international congress shall convene in joint session and ballot from day to day until the international congress shall choose a president and vice president.

The international congress shall determine the time of choosing the president and vice president and the day upon which they shall begin voting on the election of these officers.

In case of the removal of the president from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the vice president, and the congress shall, as herein provided for the election of president and vice president, elect a president pro tempore in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the president and vice president, and such officer shall act accordingly for the unexpired term or until the disability be removed.

The president shall at stated times receive for his services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the international federation of the world or any of the nations composing the federation.

Before he enters on the execution of his office he shall take the following oath or affirmation: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of president of the international federation of the world and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the constitution of the international federation of the world."

SEC. 2. The president, with advice and confirmation of the senate, shall make appointments, of civil and martial officers, and a cabinet of five members, namely, secretary of nations, secretary of the treasury, attorney general, marshal of land forces, and marshal of sea forces.

The president shall be commander in chief of the martial forces of the international federation of the world on land and sea and of the militia of the several nations when called into the actual service of the international federation of the world. He may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices, and he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for the offenses of persons against the international federation except in cases of impeachment.

The president shall have power to fill all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

He shall, from time to time, give to the international congress information of the state of the federation, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. He may on extraordinary occasions convene the international congress or either branch.

SEC. 3. That the president, vice president, and all civil officers of the international federation shall be removed from office on impeachment for and on conviction of bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE 3.

SECTION 1. That the judicial power of the international federation of the world shall be vested in an international supreme court. The judges of the supreme court shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

The international supreme court shall be chosen and vacancies filled in the court as follows: The supreme courts of the several nations composing the international federation of the world shall nominate one of their number, and the justices so nominated shall be considered by the senate of the international federation of the world, and the senate shall choose by vote, which voting shall continue from day to day until the court of 17 members is chosen from the number so nominated.

The international supreme court shall choose a chief justice from their own number.

SEC. 2. That the judicial power shall extend to all cases in international law and equity arising under this constitution and laws of the international federation of the world; to controversies to which the international federation shall be a party; to controversies between two or more nations; between a nation and citizens of another nation; between citizens of different nations.

In all cases before mentioned the international supreme court shall have either original or appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, under such regulations as the congress shall make.

ARTICLE 4.

SECTION 1. That full faith and credit shall be given in each nation to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other nation; and the congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

SEC. 2. New nations may be admitted by the international congress into the international federation of the world, but no new nation shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other nation, nor any nation be formed by the junction of two or more nations or parts of nations, without the consent of the legislatures of the nations concerned, as well as of the international congress.

The congress shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the international federation of the world, and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the international federation of the world or of any particular nation.

ARTICLE 5.

This constitution and the international laws of the international federation of the world which shall be made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme international law of the nations of the world; and the judges in every nation shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any nation to the contrary notwithstanding.

The senators and representatives before mentioned and the members of the several national legislatures and all executive and judicial officers, both of the international federation and of the several nations, and of the political subdivisions composing them, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the international federation of the world.

ARTICLE 6.

The ratification of 17 nations shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution between the nations so ratifying the same.

ARTICLE 7.

When a sufficient number of nations have adopted this constitution, the executives of the nations so ratifying shall appoint one commissioner each, which commissioners shall meet at the chosen seat of the government of the world and ascertain and announce the fact of such adoption and make temporary apportionment among the nations of the members of the two branches of the international congress, as herein provided, and make suitable provision for the meeting and organization of the international congress.

Mr. Chairman, I have suggested this constitution as a concrete proposition to accomplish the purpose that has been in the minds of many in all ages and generations. I have outlined a plan for such a federation as has been and is now looked upon as a means through which the tranquillity of the world may be secured.

Mr. Chairman, such a constitution would create a government whose authority would command the respect of the people of every nation in the world, being created, as proposed in the constitution, by the several nations with such formality as such a governmental act requires.

Mr. Chairman, I have suggested the international congress be made up of two houses as proposed, the lower house to have not more than 225 members, so that it would always be deliberative, and apportioned among the nations according to their voting population. The members of the lower house should be elected by the popular branches of the congresses of the several nations.

I have suggested that the upper branch of the federation congress should have not to exceed 96 members, apportioned among the nations according to their international commerce, and be elected by the upper branches of the national congresses of the nations represented.

The members of the lower house to be elected for 6 years and of the upper house for 12 years.

The congress of the federation should have all legislative authority with respect to international law, and to levy taxes upon the several nations for the expenses of the international federation, apportioned one-half according to the population and one-half according to international commerce of the nations. The expenses would be small compared with the expense now borne by the several nations with respect to their international relations.

The international congress should have power to regulate the carriers of international commerce and to provide that the port and harbor and tariff charges of each nation should be alike to all other nations.

The international congress in joint session is authorized and directed to elect an executive and vice executive for a term of 12 years.

The congress is authorized to create a martial force out of the armed forces of the several nations to be used by the executive in enforcing international laws and decrees and maintaining the authority of the international federation with respect solely to international questions.

The executive is the marshal in chief of the martial forces on land and sea and of the land forces of the several nations when acting under the federation.

An international supreme court of 17 members, elected in a joint session of the congress from nominations, one each made by the several supreme courts of the nations represented from among their members, is provided for. This court to have jurisdiction to try all disputed international questions, and upon these questions its decision to be final.

The congress is to establish an official language for the federation, with provision that the international laws and decrees of the court should be published in each nation in the language of that nation.

The difficulties to be overcome seem to be greater than they really are. A natural conservatism in every nation is the principal obstacle to be overcome. When that is done, the details in establishing such international authority will readily respond to intelligent effort. The mastery of an official language by the officials of the federation will not be an impossible task. In some of our own State legislatures Spanish and English are used interchangeably. Members of the Canadian Parliament use French or English as they will. The Panama Canal was built with employees who spoke every variety of language, yet no great public work was ever done more efficiently.

The ends to be attained are worthy of the sincerest and highest effort. This is an opportune time to press action upon it. It is doubtful if the world has ever been in a more deplorable condition, so far as international relations are concerned.

Mr. Chairman, two ways are open to the people of the world. On the one hand, to continue existing conditions that result in war and international anarchy; or, on the other hand, to provide an authority that shall duly enact and enforce an international code of laws for the assertion of national rights and the redress of national wrongs among all nations.

Mr. Chairman, the ugly scars that war has made on civilization make unanswerable and complete argument for such a code of international law with provisions for its orderly and effective enforcement.

The world is wearied and exhausted with blood and iron; with fire and sword; with deadly explosives and asphyxiating gases; with agents of death operating in the air, on land, on sea, and under the sea; with the destruction of the accumulations of its labor and industry and the choicest treasures of its art; by the waste of untold money and property; with grievous burdens of debt and taxes; wearied and exhausted with war as the international arbiter.

Humanity, saddened in every age and generation by war, its ruin, its squalor, its dead and wounded, its widows and orphans, its every woe and affliction, bows in anguish and in sorrow and pleads for the inauguration of the reign of authorized and orderly procedure by nations in settling their differences under international law.

Mr. Chairman, I urge, therefore, in the name of humanity, in the name of every race, of every creed, and of every religion, in the name of the world's civilization, the adoption of an international constitution clothed with authority and power to furl all battle flags "in the parliament of man, the federation of the world," and unfurl in every land and on every sea the emblem of an authority that, without doing dishonor or injustice to any, will do equal honor and justice to all, and guarantee equal security and protection to every nation beneath its folds, the great and the small, the strong and the weak, the rich and the poor, and establish tranquillity throughout the world for ourselves and for our posterity to the remotest generations of time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY].

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, through the courtesy and generosity of the chairman of our committee each member was allowed to reserve the right to vote for any amendment that should appeal to him which would conform the more clearly to his opinion. We did agree to disagree upon some amendments that might be offered according to our best judgment. I wish to read to the House a few lines from a special cable to the Washington Post printed yesterday:

LONDON, March 18.

Britain's horrible example of confusion in recruiting would seem calculated to convince the United States of the desirability of solving its military problems on thoroughly scientific lines.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we can accept some splendid examples from the few lines of yesterday's Post. There should be no dividing line between the States of the Union. They are 48 little units, but they are the United States and not separate States. There is no dividing line industrially between the various States of the Union. New England purchases the coal and the iron of Pennsylvania and Maryland and wool and hides from the West. You gentlemen, in turn, of the South and West purchase our boots and shoes and our textile products.

Now, this question may concern the near-coast and the coast States more than it does the interior, but we should all be united. We can not tell but that the enemy may water his horses at the Mississippi River instead of at the Ohio River.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLNEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Are you in favor of compulsory military service and conscription?

Mr. OLNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I do believe in universal military training, and I think our country will some day adopt that course.

Mr. GORDON. Is that why you favor this increase?

Mr. OLNEY. I favor this increase in order to be prepared. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. For compulsory service, you mean?

Mr. OLNEY. It has been difficult in the past to enlist recruits in the Regular Army, to be sure. I believe in adopting and inculcating a more democratic spirit for enlistment in the Army. I have lived in five States of this Union—Minnesota, Washington, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island. My father was born in Kentucky. I love the men of the North and the South and of the East and the West. There is no reason why we can not get together on this proposition and brush away the lines which seem to exist between the existing States.

I am cordially and heartily in favor of this Kahn amendment, because in times of emergency, when Congress may not be in session, we may be glad of the opportunity to recruit our Army up to 220,000 men. [Applause.] And, Mr. Chairman, I intend to support the amendment as a measure of expediency, conservatism, and consistency. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, most failures in the world are caused by a too thin spreading out of the resources, and if this country fails in any emergency that may arise it will be because we have not our resources assembled so as to be able to use them.

We have an Army of 100,000 men to-day. It is spread out from Maine to China and from Alaska to the Panama Canal. It is spread out so thin that we have no unit anywhere, and it can not be used to defend the country or the flag if there was necessity for a defense. We have only 34,500 men in continental America to-day. What could we do with them?

This bill provides for an additional 40,000 men in the Army—a bagatelle, and of no use. It would accomplish nothing. We have been talking about preparedness and we have agitated the public mind by our eloquence, and we have led the people to believe that Congress was going to do something to meet the situation. But this bill does not provide for that.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is something better; it is more nearly adequate. But 220,000 men in the Army would not amount to much unless we had a great Navy. A great Navy must be the first line of defense. And our Navy should be large enough to meet any expeditionary force sent from any other country in the world, in order to prevent them from reaching the American shores; but if perchance they got by our Navy, then we have our coast defenses, which are said to be the best in all the world. The Army should be the third line of defense, and that is the only excuse we can have for providing for more than 220,000 men. If an enemy should land on America's shores we should need 2,000,000 men. The American people are looking forward to adequate preparation for the defense of our institutions, and they will not be satisfied with any halfway measure. This measure proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House is not even a halfway measure. But if we had 220,000 men that could be utilized and our Navy as the first line of defense was successful, we would then be in a position to insure the protection of the coast lines of America by the first line of defense long enough to enable us to prepare an army that will come to our defense. Unless we do that we have failed in the performance of our duty. And the American people everywhere will demand to know the reason why we failed.

Oh, some say that the interior of the country is safe; that we have nothing whatever to fear; that it is only upon the seacoast that the danger lies. Ah, but, gentlemen from the interior of the country, you can not have a successful interior unless you have a successful exterior [applause], the one is dependent upon the other; and the American people look forward to the enactment of a law that will give the adequate preparation which they demand. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am one of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs who, according to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES], brought into this House a colossal joke. I am also a member of that same committee that the gentleman from Massachusetts referred to, comparing it to a mountain that labored hard and finally brought into this House a mouse instead of a bulldog. Gentlemen, I am a member of that committee, and I am not here to apologize for the bill it has brought into this House in any particular. [Applause.] I stood for it in the committee; I stand for it before the country now. [Applause.] I am ready to say it is a bill which will perform the work that is intended to be performed. This bill was not brought in here recklessly and without consideration. We had the men before us who advocated "bulldogs" for defense. We had before us men and women, good people, good citizens of this land of ours, who advocated white doves for protection. But we steered between the two and brought in a bill that provides for 140,000 men of the line in time of peace, which means 152,000 enlisted men, and which can be increased to 178,000 in time of war, and we felt that we were doing a reasonable thing.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] says, "Let us be statesmen; let us load the people up with an Army unheard of in the history of our country." Friends, it is more than that to be a statesman. It is the statesman's duty to protect the vital interests of all the people of his country. [Applause.] It is the statesman's duty not to be dominated by a few men scattered over this land who are filling this Chamber to-day with telegrams in an attempt to drive you men to saddle on the people of this country an expense that sooner or later will drive us into socialism. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am a Republican. I am proud of the traditions of my party. I glory in its past and in all the great things it has done for the country. But I am astounded to-day to hear certain sentiments uttered by men who for 16 long years controlled the destinies of this country, and all that time principally under the leadership of Uncle JOE CANNON, of Illinois, a man whose patriotism has never been questioned [applause]; and yet in all that time did the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], did my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], did the gentlemen from New York and Massachusetts or Pennsylvania come into this House with a bill asking to increase the Military Establishment of our country? [Applause.] No. And even with trouble in the Philippines, with trouble everywhere, they fixed the maximum limit in peace times at 100,000 men.

Now, fellow members of this House, I want to ask you, Do these gentlemen know the lair of the lion that is about to leap upon us? [Applause.] I challenge them to point out to me, to you, to the people of the country, whence comes this danger now, when during 16 long years men on this side of the House stood for a much smaller Military Establishment than we even propose in this bill.

Another thought, my friends: I have taken pride in the history of my party, which with careful legislation has protected the industries of our country, the laboring men of our country, and made it possible for them to earn a livelihood and pay the expenses of this Government without war taxes in time of peace. [Applause.] But I want to warn you: Saddle this burden on the people of this country and you will not only continue the present war taxes, but you will put stamps on checks, you will put a tax on gasoline, you will put a tax on automobiles, you will tax everything in this country. And why, forsooth? In order that we may be protected from attack from some enemy of which we now know naught. [Applause.]

We on this side of the House can not be condemned by the country, because when you had charge of legislation in this House and had control of the administration you knew the Kaiser was day after day building that majestic military machine of his; you knew that England was adding to her navy yearly, and yet you said, "We do not need a bigger Army." But now when these great armies are destroying each other on the bloody fields of Europe we are told, "The red-blooded men of this country demand a bigger Army."

I say to you that the red-blooded men of this country do not demand this big military establishment. [Applause.] The red-blooded men of this country fear no enemy, and do not ask that their fellow citizens may be burdened with taxation in order that men in the Regular Army may be jumped from corporal to major general. [Applause.] It is only a few people who are putting their money into sending telegrams to you and me to beat us down and compel us to put this burden upon the people. Fellow Members of the House, in God's name, do not be carried away by hysteria, but be calm, deliberate, resolute, as statesmen should be. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, the eloquent gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], who has just taken his seat, says that the Kahn amendment proposes to saddle on the people of this great country an enormous burden of taxes. Although the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I take the position that he does not understand the Kahn amendment.

It does not do anything of the sort. Section 7, under consideration, and the Kahn amendment, under consideration, are both limitations. Section 1 of this bill provides that in time of peace our military line of defense shall not be below the minimum required by law, and when war is imminent it shall be the duty to carry up this line of defense to the maximum required by law. That is the law and the act of 1901. This bill does not change that act, but, upon the contrary, reaffirms it. Now, this Kahn amendment and this section 7, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] pointed out, are both limitations. It reads—

That the total enlisted force of the line of the Army shall not exceed at any one time—

According to the language of the bill—

140,000.

The Kahn amendment says it shall not exceed 220,000; not that it shall be 220,000, not that it shall be 140,000, but that it shall not exceed 140,000, according to the bill, and shall not exceed 220,000, according to the Kahn amendment.

These things are limitations. You can not have the military line up to the maximum, to the limit, under this bill unless war is imminent. That is the language of the bill. The Kahn amendment gives a little discretion in the matter. It gives the right to increase the enlisted force beyond that, even though war is not absolutely imminent. War may not be imminent, but it may be very threatening. Conditions may be such as require readiness on our part. The Kahn amendment leaves a little discretion in the hands of those whose immediate duty it is to defend our country and its institutions from whatever foe or foes they may be threatened with. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the present bill increases the Army over its present status two-fifths. This proposed amendment increases it six-fifths, or one-fifth more than double the present status.

If the increase is proposed because of present danger, then certainly it is not large enough, but if the purpose of the increase is not that, but simply to bring it up in accordance with the necessities of times of peace, with no regard to whether we are soon to go into war or not, then I do not see the necessity of more than doubling our present status. [Applause.] If, on the other hand, the war in Europe is the incentive or the determinant to direct this legislation, this amendment means scarcely anything. For my part, while I do not know what the future may bring, I am satisfied that before a year elapses after the war closes you will have on your hands an Army requirement that you can not meet, as we can not now make up the requirements of the present establishment, including the requirements in the Navy.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. POWERS. You would not have to fill it under the Kahn amendment nor under section 7 of this bill.

Mr. FESS. I understand that; and if you would not have to fill it, there is no particular use for it now. I do not speak in opposition to this amendment because I come from an inland State simply. I am not of those who may think that because they are far from the seacoast they are not in as much danger as those on the coast. I agree with the statement—I think most people ought at least to believe—that what is protection for the coast is protection also for the inland States, and what is a danger to our coast will also be a danger to the interior country. Simply because I am a resident of an inland State I do not refuse to vote for the amendment. My opposition is not put on that ground. I am not opposed to an increase of our national defense. I am in favor of a rational increase, and when it comes to strengthening our first line of defense, the Navy, as well as our second line, I will be with those who believe in a substantial increase, and I am willing also to increase the weak spot in this third line of defense, the mobile army. The bill now before use gives an increase of two-fifths of the present establishment. I will vote for this, but I do not see any reason at this time for going to the extent of one-fifth more than doubling the present status, and under these circumstances I can not vote for this increase. [Applause.] I think there is such a wide variety of opinion, as expressed here, that every Member must do what I believe Members are doing, and that is use his own judgment.

This increase in the bill as reported by a unanimous vote of committee is as much of an increase, lacking a thousand men, as Secretary Garrison originally suggested, and nobody would say that he was a pacifist. The amendment before us goes further than the recommendation of Gen. Wood and is only a little short of the recommendation of the War College. Without desiring to criticize any group of men, we must not lose sight of the natural bent of mind determined by the character of investigation. The War College is largely professional, and naturally would recommend a large increase. Investigation looking to a military establishment would naturally lead to maximum increase.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it not true that Secretary Garrison recommended a supplemental continental army of between 400,000 and 500,000 men?

Mr. FESS. And we supersede the continental army recommendation by federalizing the National Guard.

Mr. GARDNER. We should still have had the National Guard under his recommendation.

Mr. FESS. We would not have had the National Guard federalized.

Mr. GARDNER. It would have been federalized as much as it will be by this bill.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will if I have time. I would like half a minute to make one other statement——

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I just want to say that the bill gives not a thousand more but 30,000 more than Secretary Garrison asked for in his report.

Mr. FESS. I can not yield further now. I can not vote with the extreme pacifists. For them I have respect, but for their contention I have very little respect. I can not vote with what may be called the extreme military Members. Our country will not stand for their contention. Both of these positions can not be correct. It is likely that neither is correct. It is most certain that the safe position of the country is not in the extreme but somewhere between them. The bill before us is not extreme. The amendment, I fear, is more than is demanded. I shall therefore vote against the amendment and for the bill.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

[Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, there are times when discretion must be reposed in the President of the United States. You can not say that war is imminent, but you can sometimes say that there are exigencies that require discretion. In the early days of the Republic the statutes allowed George Washington and successive Presidents to enroll extra regiments at their discretion.

In 1844 or 1845 Congress gave power to our then President to double, if he thought necessary, the number of enlisted men in every troop and every company.

In the year 1899 we gave authority to the President to maintain the Army at a certain figure that was then large, distributing the men among the various branches of the service.

I agree with gentlemen that this section as it stands is a limitation. It ought not to be. This section ought to read:

SEC. 7. That the total enlisted force of the line of the army, in the discretion of the President that an exigency so requires, may be increased by him to 220,000 men, to be distributed by him among the several branches of the service according to the needs of each.

Our Army is curiously top-heavy, and rightly so. It has too many officers. It is common in a troop or in a company that 25 men have to be detailed. Some will be in the guardhouse, some will be recruits who can not serve, some will be sick, some will be used as clerks or in charge of property, and there will be some vacancies, so that if there be only 65 or 75 privates in a Cavalry troop there will be only about 40 in line, with three commissioned officers and some noncommissioned officers. It is the same in our Infantry. In case of emergency it is men that will be needed, and discretion should be given to fill up the ranks of the companies and troops and to enlarge the number of enlisted men. They may be wanted.

Mr. HAY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, ideas or conceptions of preparedness vary all the way from "peace at any price" to "armament regardless of price."

No one has yet been able to define or state what constitutes preparedness. Preparedness is a condition, very elusive and never to be attained. The professional man when he obtains his license or diploma to practice law or medicine simply has a legal permit to prosecute his profession, but the old experienced lawyer or doctor, when he retires from the practice, realizes the vastness of his lack of knowledge of his profession.

If Germany with her marvelous fighting machine with which she has since been successfully fighting the world had been prepared, she would have gone on to Paris. France with her highly trained soldiers and universal military service, single handed would have been helpless before the invading Germans. Italy with her military prowess and preparation has not to this hour been able to press the Austrian line back any appreciable distance. Russia with millions upon millions of splendid soldiers has been driven back like a mob. Again I ask you what constitutes the preparedness for which there is such a loud clamor? How will we raise the money with which to pay the cost? It is a proposition that Congress can not afford to plunge headlong and recklessly into.

How many soldiers shall we place on the back of each taxpayer? Have you counted the cost according to the American scale of wages? Shall we adopt the Prussian, Russian, French, Italian, or Austrian military program? Behold the combined naval fleets of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia powerless before the Dardanelles and Gallipoli. Will American preparedness fall short of this combination? Of what effective service is the German Navy, second largest in the world, to-day—bottled up in the Kiel Canal?

These questions have been propounded for the purpose of riveting attention of the House on the magnitude of the problem, with the hope that we may be the better able to obtain our bearings.

Complete preparation as contemplated by the American militarists comprises a state of armament on the sea equal to that of Great Britain plus an amount of efficiency capable of driving the British Navy off the sea as she has driven Germany off the sea, and an army possessing all the efficiency of the German Army plus the ability not only to successfully resist that army but to overcome it. Great Britain's Navy and Germany's Army are the products of a century's development and represent an expense that would bankrupt even so resourceful a country as our own, if it were attempted to attain such a degree of military supremacy and efficiency within a short limit of time. It would mean the defeat of any party that would attempt such a program.

The bill under consideration is not the last word on the question of preparedness. Nobody claims that it is. It is the beginning of what I hope will prove to be an efficient military organization. This administration inherited an unorganized Army and Navy from its predecessors and is attempting, under the most trying circumstances, to construct an efficient and effective organization in each establishment. Preparedness and efficiency must go hand in hand, and the two together on a scale large enough mean victory.

Recent events do not justify the claim that our Army is an efficient military machine. The attack made by the Mexicans on Columbus, N. Mex., discloses an inexcusable situation and condition in that the portion of the Army camped there was taken completely by surprise, and the further report that our machine guns were, for some unexplained reason, out of commission. It is criminal to be expending millions of money collected from the taxpayer if better results than these are not to be obtained. There is likewise severe criticism of the types of aeroplanes that are in the service, being better fitted for the junk heap and mantraps than they are for effective and efficient service in the Army. It is a matter of intense regret that so many alleged accidents happen to our submarines.

The criticisms that have been made on the character and type of shells with which our battleships and cruisers are supplied present a most deplorable condition. The slow and dilatory manner in which our navy yard and naval contractors perform their contracts would indicate almost criminal carelessness on the parts of those whose duties it is to supervise this important and vital part of the country's defense. The blame for the faulty construction of the aeroplanes, submarines, shells, and dilatory naval construction is not properly chargeable to this administration, nor can it be truthfully said that these faults lie at the door of Congress. Congress has met all the reasonable demands for appropriations from the departments, but the departments have not heretofore exhibited that degree of thoroughness which would inspire Congress with sufficient confidence to double its appropriations for fear that it would only result in an added waste of public funds.

Nations, like individuals, have conditions thrust upon them. The present administration has religiously striven for peace; yet we see at this very moment how the actions of other nations may involve us in war against our will. The interference by Great Britain in our commerce is almost, if not quite, as serious as Villa and his bandits in their invasion of American territory. One is a violation of American rights on land and the other is a plain violation of American rights on the sea. While I recognize the fact that it is the exclusive and sole prerogative and duty of the executive department to deal with and conduct all diplomatic negotiations concerning our international affairs, I am extremely anxious to see that department take hold with a firm and vigorous grasp of the wanton interference by Great Britain with our legitimate over-sea trade with neutrals, and more especially with its unpardonable interception of our foreign mails.

It is time to serve unmistakable notice that the patience, tolerance, and endurance of the American people are exhausted; that the day of reckoning has arrived. England's usurpation and violation of our commercial rights on the highways of the free seas, Germany's barbarous submarine warfare, Villa's invasion of American territory, have sounded wars' alarm throughout this hitherto peaceful and peace-loving Nation. Let the world take notice and beware that once the sword is drawn it will be not soon sheathed.

The world saw that the Congress of the United States was in full accord and ready to support and sustain the President in his efforts to adjust international affairs when the McLemore resolution was buried by an overwhelming majority. The Congress had no more jurisdiction of the subject matter of the resolution than a police court has of a proceeding in chancery. Everyone hopes, trusts, and prays that no American will be so unmindful of his country's welfare as to assume undue or unwarranted risks, but the significance of the action of Congress is thoroughly understood around the world.

I have no patience with those who are blaming Congress because it is unable to turn out an army of the highest efficiency over night. It ill becomes certain ex-Presidents and ex-Secretaries of War who battle harder for the limelight and political spot light when they are out of office than for military and naval efficiency when they were in office.

The act of April 25, 1914, passed by a Democratic Congress, provides for the raising of a volunteer army of unlimited proportions. Under the Constitution Congress alone can declare war. If it is not in session when war becomes unavoidable it would be the duty of the President to call it in extraordinary session for the purpose of declaring war; then, in this event, the volunteer forces recruited under this act, together with the Federalized Militia, would be available for every emergency. The same Congress would promptly pass every measure demanded by the exigencies of the occasion. The purpose of the present bill is to provide for an adequate army in time of peace. Should unwelcome war be forced upon us, no one entertains a doubt that, no matter how many millions are included in the call, it will be met with promptness and alacrity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has 22 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Virginia has 30 minutes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the only question Congress has to consider is what is the practical way to spend the money we are going to set aside. The difference between an army of 140,000 and an army of 220,000 men is about $80,000,000 a year, as far as the cost is concerned. It has been admitted here that this Nation must depend on its volunteer citizen soldiery. You can not get away from that. The money that it would cost to equip 80,000 men would, if put into equipment for forces on the sea and for the National Guard and other organizations necessary for the second line of defense, go much further toward preparing us to defend ourselves. And when it comes to a show-down, they will not all be from Massachusetts or New York, either. [Laughter and applause.]

It seems to me that the purpose of the whole war program is to see if we can not reach far back to the grass roots and put into the hands of men in civil life everything we possibly can give them to encourage training, and not to 80,000 men who may be loafing most of the time. We should put in the hands of a million men making their living every day, and doing extra work besides, all the equipment possible. I can see no reason for the amendment. I believe the practical question before Congress is whether we shall spend the appropriation to hire men to do nothing, or spend the money for guns, powder, ammunition plants somewhere away from the seacoast, so that somebody in the center of the country may occasionally know that we might have need for an army later on. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT].

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, the time allotted to me is probably sufficient to say all that I know about the subject, but hardly enough to indicate what I think about it.

I propose to vote for this amendment. [Applause.] I shall do so because it is a step to the right end. I am not in favor of a large standing army. I believe in universal training upon some such plan as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER]. The citizenry of this country should be the bulwark of its defense. But so long as you have pacifist Members in this House without regard to the opinions of their constituents upon the question of defense, it is better to take a step in the direction indicated by the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] than to blind ourselves to present-day necessities. The idea that an army of 220,000 men commits a nation of 100,000,000 people to "militarism" is too absurd to countenance.

We have at the present time in the United States 34,000 men available for military duty; 18,000 of these men have either gone across the border into Mexico or are on the border at the present time. How many gentlemen here realize the fact that the border line between the United States and the Republic of Mexico is more than 1,700 miles long, greater, in fact, than the distance of a straight line from the city of Washington to the city of Denver. And if you were to take all of the troops now in Mexico, and on the border, and string them out on the line between the United States and Mexico you would have 10 soldiers for every mile.

A few days ago the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] emphasized the danger of war with England rather than with Germany. The length of our northern frontier is 3,400 miles, and if you take all the troops available in the United States to-day you would be able to put no more in proportion to the length of the northern boundary of the United States than you can at the present time along the southern boundary. Is that adequate protection?

Nearly a year ago the Democratic Party in New York City recorded its approval of preparedness. At the annual Fourth of July celebration of that patriotic organization, the Society of the Columbian Order, a term synonymous with Tammany Hall, whose existence dates back to within two weeks of the inauguration of George Washington, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolution adopted at Tammany Society on July 4, 1915.

We, the citizens of the United States and of the State of New York, in mass meeting assembled, under the auspices of the Society of Tammany, on the anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of American Independence, in order to secure action by Congress and the State legislatures of measures deemed necessary for the security and the prosperity of the Republic, for the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine, the policy of the open door in China, the policy of ultimate freedom to the Philippines, and the reestablishment of democracy in Mexico, and for the preservation of law and order, do hereby Resolve, That until world peace is reasonably certain of realization the United States must provide for an adequate Army and Navy as a means of defense of its principles and institutions; that Congress and the administration be urged to institute an immediate inquiry into the defenses of the Nation to determine the expediency of enlarging and strengthening the Army and Navy of the United States and the National Guard of the States and the organization of reserves for several branches of our naval and military forces.

[Applause.]

Before this session of Congress opened—13 months having elapsed since my election—I conducted a mail poll of my constituents, and I found an overwhelming sentiment in favor of preparedness. And why? We have the need of it and will pay the greater part of the expense of it.

One-thirteenth of the entire population of the United States now lives in the New York metropolitan district. New York City produces one-tenth of the entire manufactured product of the United States, more than any other State except Pennsylvania.

The value of New York's taxable property exceeds that of Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis combined. New York City banks handle 60 per cent of the clearings of the United States.

New York is the terminus of all but one of the great eastern railroad systems.

Approximately one-half of the exports and imports of the United States pass through New York Harbor, and from the merchandise imported through the port of New York more than double the amount of duties is collected and turned into the Federal Treasury than from all other ports of the United States together. And I had almost overlooked the fact and nearly failed to mention that New York State contributed, in addition thereto, $17,417,537.60, nearly one-half, of the individual income tax, and $10,221,206.65, or more than one-fourth, of the corporation income tax collected during the year 1915. What an opportunity for plunder and tribute! And does it not concern the whole people?

But the demand for preparedness is Nation wide. Less than two weeks ago a conference of mayors, representing practically every State in the Union, was held at St. Louis, at which resolutions were adopted, of which I desire to put a copy in the RECORD and yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

NATIONAL DEFENSE—CONFERENCE OF MAYORS AND MAYORS' COMMITTEES.

Resolutions unanimously adopted at St. Louis, March 4, 1916.

Whereas the purpose of the establishment of the Republic was, among other things, to provide for the common defense, and thereby to secure to ourselves the blessings of liberty and peace; and

Whereas this Nation is to-day without adequate defense by sea or land, and is almost wholly without the means to protect its territory, defend its people, or safeguard its institutions against possible aggression; and

Whereas for the common national defense there are required an adequate Navy, ample coast defenses, a mobile army, and a mobilization of the organized physical resources of the Nation; and

Whereas the General Board of the Navy has reported to the Secretary of the Navy that "our present Navy is not sufficient to give due weight to the diplomatic remonstrance of the United States in peace nor to enforce its policies in war"; and

Whereas we believe that the Navy should be increased with all speed until we shall have become the first naval power of the world, with strength on the Atlantic equal to that of any other power upon that ocean, and with additional strength upon the Pacific such as to make of us the first naval power upon that ocean; and

Whereas the General Staff of the Army has submitted to the War Department a plan for a moderate increase of the Regular Army and for the organization, distribution, and equipment thereof, and for the increase and complete manning of coast defenses: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the mayors and members of Mayors' Committees upon National Defense of the Cities of the United States, in convention assembled, do hereby demand the immediate authorization by Congress of the building program of the General Board of the Navy of July 30, 1915, together with such additions and modifications as their expert knowledge and experience may indicate to be necessary at this time. And we do further demand that the personnel of the Navy be increased in conformity with the requirements of the service as interpreted by the General Board.

Resolved, That we demand the increase and complete manning of coast defenses as recommended by the General Staff.

Resolved, That we demand the immediate increase, organization, and disposition of the Regular Army as recommended by the General Staff.

Resolved, That recognizing the military obligation equally with the civic obligation as a fundamental duty of Democratic citizenship in a Republic, and to establish a system which will affect alike every man in the Republic, we approve and recommend the adoption of universal military training under Federal control throughout the United States.

Resolved, That we approve and recommend the immediate formulation of plans by the Federal Government for the organization and mobilization of the physical resources of the country, and to that end, among other things, we specifically recommend:

That all arsenals, ordnance, rifle, and other munition-producing plants supported by Federal appropriation be located at a distance from the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards and from the Canadian and Mexican borders, as recommended in the recent report of the General Staff of the Army.

That steps be taken by the Federal Government to effect in time of peace a standardization of all material which may be required by the Government in time of war.

That the transportation facilities, industries, and general resources of the country be so marshaled and organized as to make them promptly available for service upon the outbreak of war.

That Federal legislation to effectuate the foregoing be enacted by the present Congress.

And be it further resolved, That copies of these resolutions be at once transmitted to the Senate and to the House of Representatives, and that a copy thereof be transmitted at once to each Senator and Representative of the National Congress.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to oppose my friend and colleague from California [Mr. KAHN], but I am opposed to this amendment. I believe I have conveyed to the members of this committee the thought that I am in favor of a strong citizen soldiery. I believe the future welfare and the future safety of the Nation lies not in our Regular Army, but lies in that strong body of men that we will enlist under the banner of the National Guard. I am in favor of increasing the number and the efficiency of the National Guard until every man in this United States shall say that it is strong enough to defend our country and our honor. I am one of those who believe there is no immediate danger of our country being attacked. I think there is no crying need of an immediate and superficial increase in the Army; rather do I believe that we should begin at the very foundation and build up a mighty and efficient force that, should the time come, when we do need to fight for defense we should have an Army not only strong in numbers but strong in efficiency. It is the great volunteer army of the United States that we must depend upon for our future safety and support. It is the men who will be trained in the National Guard that will form this vast body of men who will be the bulwark of the Nation's defense.

Believing as I do, I see no reason why we should increase the Regular Army to a greater number than is done in the bill as originally presented by the committee. Hitherto we have deemed ourselves amply protected with the Army as it now is. All this while our National Guard has not been trained to any degree of efficiency. Now we are proposing to double, even quadruple, the National Guard. We are proposing in this bill to train nearly a million men to become efficient in the art of warfare. This is to be done in the brief period of a few years. These are the men that we are to look to in case war should break out. Why, then, should we add to this effective fighting force the burden of a larger standing army? This amendment proposes to increase the Regular Army about 80,000 over the provisions of the bill as originally presented. Eighty thousand men will be a big tax burden on the people. It must be remembered that once these 80,000 men are enlisted they are not to be discharged with impunity. Once we add that 80,000 to our roll, it will stay there always.

As I figure it, we can train 10 men in the National Guard for the sum that it will cost to keep 1 soldier a year. Why not spend the sum that it would cost to keep these 80,000 troops in training our citizen soldiery? It would give us an additional Army of 800,000 men. The cost of paying and maintaining these extra 80,000 troops it is proposed we add for five years would train every able-bodied man in the United States for a citizen soldier in that length of time. Let us get the greatest amount of efficiency with the least amount of money.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss].

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, the long period of peace which this country has enjoyed for the past half century—a peace interrupted only by the relatively unimportant Spanish-American War—and a contemporaneous period of peace among the great powers of Europe produced in the minds of many of our people the conviction that wars had become impossible and that an epoch of universal peace was about to supervene. There were many indications which led thinking men to doubt the soundness of this conviction, but a systematically fostered propaganda had lulled the majority of our people into a belief that war could only come of our own choosing, and that we should escape its horrors by ignoring its possibility and making no preparation for it. From this delusion we have been rudely awakened by the great war now being waged in Europe, and an insistent demand for a better national defense has arisen in all parts of the Nation. There is no question about the earnestness of the people in regard to this question. But as a nation we have stood aloof from military matters, and the great mass of the people are unfamiliar with what constitutes the essentials of military preparation. It is important that no specious substitute for preparation, running into high numbers on paper but actually spelling little or no advance in the way of real preparation, be offered as a sedative to quiet the popular demand. The people must not be deceived.

The European war is the reaction which has precipitated the present movement for a better national defense. From it we can learn what constitutes real military preparation. In the light of the facts brought out in the present conflict we can review our own past military history from a saner viewpoint and with a less hysterical exaltation of American prowess than has characterized the description of our military achievements in our school histories. We can learn wherein our military system has been faulty and what steps are necessary to amend it. We can also determine the extent to which the measure now before this House removes the glaring defects in our military system.

At the commencement of the War of the Revolution we were not a nation, and therefore the war is interesting in connection with our military policy only in so far as it indicates the source from which our policy sprang. During it were developed the systems of militia and volunteers and of pensions and bounties. Militia and volunteer systems are due to an illogical fear of a standing army; pensions and bounties, to the failure to have available trained troops. Washington justly appreciated the value of this system when he said:

> To place any dependence upon militia is assuredly resting upon a broken reed. Men just dragged from the tender scenes of domestic life, unaccustomed to the din of arms, totally unacquainted with every kind of military skill (which is followed by want of confidence in themselves when opposed by troops regularly trained, disciplined and appointed, superior in knowledge, and superior in arms), are timid and ready to fly from their own shadows.
> There is every reason to believe that the war has been protracted on this account. Our opposition being less, the successes of the enemy have been greater. Had we kept a permanent army on foot, the enemy could have had nothing to hope for, and would in all probability have listened to terms long since.

During this war 395,000 men were called to the colors. The greatest number who responded in any one year was 89,600. From this number the largest force Washington was ever able to mass upon the battle field was a little less than 17,000. At the Battles of Trenton and Princeton, during the time of our greatest peril, his effective strength was less than 4,000. The number of men the British had in this country at any one time varied from 20,000 to 40,000. We thus had at all times under arms an Army two or three times greater than our enemy.

The cost of the war, exclusive of bounties paid by States and counties and of supplies seized in the prosecution of war, amounted to $170,000,000, which with the $200,000,000 pledged by Congress to redeem the currency makes a total of $370,000,000, a per capita cost of $123—a greater per capita cost than was incurred in the Civil War.

In the War of 1812 the militia system was again found to be inefficient. In several instances the governors refused to call out their contingents, on several occasions the militia refused to cross the frontiers even to help their comrades engaged in battle, and in others, their term of enlistment having expired, they refused the appeal of their commander and returned to their homes, though at the time they were confronting the enemy. Disobedience of orders and mutiny were common.

During this war an example of the incompetency of the system is well illustrated in the burning of our Capitol. A British fleet with 3,000 troops had hovered on the shores of the Chesapeake for a year, but not until June, 1814, was any attention paid to the protection of the Capital. On July 1 the President submitted to his Cabinet a proposition to call out two or three thousand militia to be stationed near the Capital, while ten or twelve thousand more from Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia were to be held in constant readiness. This plan was approved. Gen. Winder was appointed on July 2 to command the troops, not on account of his abilities, but because as a native of Maryland and a relative of the governor his services would be useful in meeting opposition to the war. Gov. Winder was authorized to call out, when needed, about 15,000 militia. On August 13 he reported that he called on the governor of Maryland for 3,000 men and about 1,000 had responded. On August 20 he called on the militia en masse, and on August 24 reported that his army had assembled. It numbered 5,401. On the same day this army hastily formed in order of battle at Bladensburg. It was attacked and routed in the presence of the President and his Cabinet with a loss of only 8 killed and 11 wounded. The British force which inflicted this defeat consisted of 1,500 men. After the battle Washington was burned and the British retired to their ships without opposition.

The War of 1812 lasted about three years, during which we employed 527,654 men; the largest number in any one year was 235,839; and for the same year the largest number of British regulars opposed to this force was 16,500. We failed to maintain our contention in it, and the only decisive land victory we gained was the Battle of the Thames, if we except the Battle of New Orleans, fought after the signing of the treaty of peace. The cost is estimated to have been $240,000,000, exclusive of pensions.

A large degree of the success which we attained in the War of 1812 and the Revolution was due to the assistance which we received from other powers. France aided us in the Revolution and in 1812 England was so fully occupied in the Napoleonic wars that she could give but scant attention to us.

The failure of the militia in the War of 1812 brought an end to its use as a Federal force until it was again revived in the face of the lessons of history by the militia law of 1903.

To a nation which depends for the most part upon raising its forces after the outbreak of war the length of time required to bring a new army to a state of efficiency is a fact of primary importance. For unless it has sufficient force to stand off the enemy until its new armies are capable of action it is doomed to defeat. Our own past history furnishes very clear information on this point. During the War of the Revolution, although preparations on the part of the colonies began as early as 1774, we suffered a series of defeats without a single victory, although our numbers greatly exceeded those of our opponent, until the end of the year 1776. No important victory was won until late in the year 1777. The history of the first year of the War of 1812 does not disclose a single American victory. The uninterrupted series of victories to the credit of our Army in the Mexican War were not won by untrained troops. The armies with which Gen. Scott and Gen. Taylor won their great successes were composed of Regulars and Volunteers of more than six months' thorough training. In the Civil War not a single engagement of any magnitude was fought for a year after its outbreak. The minor engagements of the first year of the war, including Bull Run, do not justify the conclusion that material results can be accomplished with untrained troops. In all these cases there elapsed a period varying from six months to one year before the troops raised were capable of effectively participating in active operations. This period may therefore be taken as the time required for converting our resources in personnel into actual power.

The present European war has brought out, perhaps, more clearly than any previous conflict the difference which exists between potential resources and actual military power. It also throws some light on the process by which latent resources are converted into actual power. It has taken Great Britain more than a year and one-half to effect this process of conversion, and it does not appear to have been even yet completed.

As regards the personal element, this process of conversion of latent resources may be expressed by the word "training." It is evident to any one who has given the matter serious thought that any number of men assembled for action and armed with any weapons whatever do not necessarily constitute an efficient military force. For this reason, armed mobs have always been helpless in the face of organized military forces, even when their numbers were greatly superior. What is not so generally understood seems to be the effort and length of time required to create a force capable of striking a concentrated blow in unison instead of dispersing its power in ineffectual individual and uncoordinated assaults. Only a force trained and disciplined for a long period is capable of the unified action necessary to success. This is the lesson taught by the present world conflict and our own military history.

In the face of these facts, what is the proposal of the Committee on Military Affairs for the improvement of the military system which proved defective in the past and which will constantly prove inadequate to the demands of any great war in the future?

Briefly, it is proposed to increase the mobile forces of the Regular Army by 40,000 men. This increase is to be distributed over a period of four years, so that the only increase immediately contemplated is 10,000 men. This represents the measure to which the striking force of the military arm of the United States Government—the only one which can be counted on for service within a period of from 6 to 12 months after the outbreak of war—is to be increased at the present time.

But the main feature of the proposed bill consists in resting practically our entire system of defense upon the Organized Militia, raised, trained, and administered by the several States. In spite of its proved inadequacy in all our past wars, it is now proposed to fasten this system upon the country so firmly that it can never be shaken off should it again prove inadequate.

What will be the degree of efficiency of this force which is to be our main military reliance? Section 54 of the bill prescribes periods of instruction consisting of 48 assemblies for drill and instruction of one and one-half hours each and a 15 days' annual encampment. From past experience with the Organized Militia it may be doubted whether this standard will ever be attained by the great body of the Organized Militia. But accepting the standard as practicable, it results that the total maximum annual instruction will be equivalent to 192 hours, or 576 hours in an enlistment of three years. How does this compare with the standard of instruction of the military forces of the great world powers? I am informed that in France the total period of instruction of the private soldier amounts to 8,014 hours; in Germany, 5,832 hours; in Austria-Hungary, 5,472 hours; in Russia, 3,600 hours; in Japan, 5,400 hours. While this great disproportion exists as to the quantity of instruction in point of time, there is even a greater difference in the quality of instruction. The armory drills of the National Guard are necessarily limited to such elementary instruction as can be given on the restricted space of an armory floor, while European armies are instructed on the actual terrain under conditions as closely simulating those of actual war as it is possible to approximate in time of peace. The forces of the great foreign powers are instructed by professional officers who have devoted their entire life to the military profession, while our National Guard is officered by men who can give only occasional attention to military affairs. With the time available for instruction, it is impracticable to carry the instruction of our National Guard beyond the work of the company. This means that there can be no practical instruction of majors, colonels, and other higher officers.

The performance of the Australian troops in the present war has been cited in the report of the committee as a demonstration of the efficiency of militia as compared to thoroughly trained regulars. While granting the superiority of the Australian system over anything that we have as yet produced in this country, it is well to bear in mind that the Australian troops were far from being in a state of readiness for war upon the outbreak of the present conflict. They were first mobilized in Egypt, and there subjected to a rigid course of instruction for a period of nine months before they were considered capable of engaging in active operations. They were put into action as soon as was possible, for troops were greatly needed at that period of the war. Nevertheless, Gen. Sir Ian Hamilton, who commanded them in the attack on the Dardanelles, in the report which was recently made public, attributes the failure of the attack in a large measure to the lack of training of the troops. A similar experience was had with the Canadian militia and the territorial militia of England. They all required a long period of training after the outbreak of war to fit them for active service.

The Swiss militia system has also been greatly extolled, and undoubtedly it represents the highest degree of efficiency of which a militia system is capable. Nevertheless the current statement that its high degree of efficiency preserved Switzerland from the invasion which was the fate of Belgium in the present war must be accepted with a considerable degree of reserve. It is much more probable that Switzerland's immunity from invasion was due to the mountainous character of its terrain and the consequent obstacle to the development of a swift offensive, which was on the other hand greatly favored by the open and unobstructed flats of Flanders. The slow course which the invasion of France took in the region of the Vosges Mountains abutting on Switzerland as compared with the rapid advance on the northern end of the line is sufficient demonstration of the correctness of this contention.

The Swiss militia system has been called upon to stand no test during the present war. However, in the period just preceding the present war, in 1913, an entire brigade of Swiss militia mutinied against the control of its officers when called upon to execute a maneuver under disagreeable conditions of weather—an occurrence which indicates that even the Swiss militia is not endowed with that high degree of discipline which is necessary to success in modern war. Commenting on this occurrence, Gen. Wille, the commander in chief of the Swiss military establishment, said:

> Such a command is entirely unreliable: it is useless for war, be it ever so fit for performances and be the individuals composing it ever so heroic, knowing no nobler object in life than to die for the fatherland. It is only by and through military training that these excellent military characteristics become of value, for it is absolutely only military training which creates that reliability that never fails in any situation. * * *
> If nothing more serious than disagreeable weather justifies renunciation of military obedience and a running away, can one imagine how such heroes would run if, instead of being exposed to rain and snow, they found themselves exposed to a shower of bullets?
> But as long as we all endeavor to palliate such things and lack the courage to tell our lord and master, the sovereign people, this unpleasant truth to his face the malady remains incurable, and our army will never be what our lord and master, the sovereign people, expect it to be, namely, the reliable, dependable defender of our liberty.

I have cited these facts without any intention of decrying the value of citizen soldiery, which must always be an important element in our system of defense. My object is solely to emphasize the fact that citizen soldiers can not be expected to perform the duties which can be carried out only by thoroughly trained Regulars, and that they must be given a thorough course of training after the outbreak of war to fit them to participate in action with any chances of success. This fact is of especial importance by reason of the statement in report of the Committee on Military Affairs that the bill now before this House provides for a force of 1,324,790 "trained" men, who will be available upon the passage of the bill.

As a matter of fact there will be available for actual service within one year after the passage of the bill a force of only 10,000 greater strength than our present inadequate establishment. This is the measure of the increased force with which we may expect to confront the world at this critical juncture in international affairs. We can not expect military service of the great mass of the material which the committee has included in its force of 1,324,790 before the end of the first year of any war in which we may engage. In the meantime we shall have available for service in the United States a mobile force of only 50,000 men.

The lumping in one round sum of all men in the country who have had military training, varying from the thorough instruction of the Regular soldier to the slight smattering acquired in military schools and the National Guard, shows a failure to appreciate the difference in the value of the different classes of troops.

Moreover, only a very small fraction of the force included in the committee's figures will be actually available for any service whatever. The men included in the item, "men trained and in the country," to the number of 995,790—the bulk of the committee's army—are not available, for they have contracted no obligation to serve the country, and could not be located if there were power to enforce their service. With its paper force of 1,324,790, the committee has resurrected the "million men raised overnight" of William Jennings Bryan.

I have expressed my belief that a citizen soldiery must be an important element in our defense. It is necessary, however, to qualify this statement with some reservations. Unless we are able to create a civilian army, subject in all respects to the control of the Federal Government, we are building upon shifting sand. In respect to the Organized Militia, the Constitution has granted the Federal Government the power to prescribe certain rules for the organization, armament, and discipline of the militia, reserving all other powers, including government and appointment of officers, to the States. In its statement the committee contends that—if Congress has the power under the Constitution to prescribe certain things, it must have the power to enforce what it prescribes.

In this contention the committee ignores the fundamental principle upon which our political system is based. Our Government is composed of two separate and mutually independent systems, the Federal Government and the State governments. In no sense of the word and in no respect whatever are the State governments subordinate to the Federal Government. Hence the governors of the States, who are the commanders in chief of the militia of their respective States, can not be made subordinates of the Federal Government nor required to carry out its orders. The Organized Militia is an integral part of the State governments, created by the enactments of State legislatures. Any action that the Federal Government may take in regard to it must be put into effect through the governors of the States. What means is there at the disposal of the Federal Government to require these independent officials to execute its orders?

Moreover, the Constitution expressly reserves to the States the authority of governing the militia in time of peace. If this means anything, it means that the duty of carrying out all administrative acts, including the constitution of courts-martial and the conduct of instruction, devolves upon the States; it means, moreover, that the State officials must carry into effect any measure which the Federal Government may prescribe in pursuance of its constitutional power to provide for the organization, armament, and discipline of the militia. How then can it be contended that Congress "must have the power to enforce what it prescribes"? What means has the committee provided for such enforcement? I have perused the bill formulated by the committee rather carefully, and I have failed to find any positive measure for the enforcement of the provisions of the bill.

In our past history governors have refused to furnish their militia to the Federal Government; and although such action was in plain violation of the provisions of the Constitution, the Federal Government appears to have been powerless to require them to carry out their duty. How much more difficult will it be to enforce a requirement concerning whose legality there may be a justifiable objection!

Is there in this Congress any lawyer who will subscribe to the constitutionality of the sections of the bill now before us authorizing the President of the United States to convene courts-martial for the trial of members of the militia in time of peace while the Constitution expressly reserves the authority of the government of the militia to the States? Or that the States may not dismiss an officer without the approval of the President? Or that Congress can legislate to require the civil officers of the States to execute all process and sentences of courts-martial? Or that the Federal Government can prescribe the method by which vacancies shall be filled in time of war in the various grades when the Constitution expressly gives to the States the power of appointment of officers both in peace and in war? The power given to the States to appoint the officers of the militia is express and unconditional; the bill now before this House assumes to restrict that power.

In its report the committee has adopted the opinions expressed in a report of the military council of the State of Missouri. In that report the statement is made that the military system of Switzerland "is identical with that of our militia system, save and except service there is compulsory, while here it is voluntary. Switzerland is composed of a number of Cantons which are civil subdivisions corresponding to our States. Under the Swiss system, each Canton raises and trains its own force and selects the officers thereof."

This statement ignores the fundamental difference between our own governmental system and that of Switzerland. The Swiss Canton does not correspond to our State. The Cantons of Switzerland are subdivisions of the nation and subordinate to the national government. The Canton officials are therefore subordinate to the officials of the general government, and consequently subject to their direction. The Government of Switzerland is not constituted like our own, on the principle of two independent systems of government, each sovereign in its own prescribed sphere. It is this fundamental principle of our Government that most seriously operates against the possibility of ever making the State militia a dependable force for national purposes.

The report of the committee bases our national defense upon the State Militia "because the organization was already in existence, composed of 129,000 men, and was ready to be disciplined, trained, and organized as is provided for in the Constitution." The militia law now on the statute books contains provision for carrying into effect the constitutional powers of the Federal Government in respect to the militia. Unless it shall appear that the provisions of that law were enforceable, there is no reason to believe that the more extended powers which the proposed law purports to confer upon the Federal Government can be made effective.

What are the actual facts in regard to the present condition of the militia as a result of the passage of the militia law of 1903 in accordance with which the Federal Government has been making an annual average expenditure of $6,000,000 for the development of the Organized Militia for the past 13 years?

At the last annual Federal inspection, 564 officers and 19,382 enlisted men were absent. In 301 companies, the physical examination was below the required standard. During the calendar year 1914 the average number of men absent from each assembly for drill and instruction was 63,201 or nearly 50 per cent of the entire strength of the Organized Militia. Thirty-seven per cent of the infantry strength of the Organized Militia did not attend the 24 assemblies for drill and instruction required by the militia law. Of the total enlisted strength of approximately 120,000 men, 37,000 did not attend the camp of instruction prescribed by the militia law. At the last Federal inspection the instruction of 330 companies was rated as poor and 932 companies were below the standard of efficiency. In respect to marksmanship the reports rendered by the State adjutants general for 1914 show that only 34.8 per cent of the strength of the Organized Militia received instruction in target practice, although such instruction is expressly prescribed in the militia law. Only 21,039 are reported as having qualified in gallery practice, which is the simplest form of instruction with the rifle.

A large fluctuating element exists throughout the militia consisting of men who serve for a short period and are then discharged. In some companies more than 50 per cent of the strength is annually discharged before completing their enlistment period.

The carelessness with which Government property is guarded is shown by the fact that Federal property to the value of $1,352,761.14 issued to the various States for the purpose of arming, equipping, and training the militia has been lost or destroyed through carelessness and neglect. Reports of inspecting officers for 1914 show that in 379 companies of the Organized Militia the rifles were in poor condition. This means that not only is valuable Government property being allowed to deteriorate through neglect, but also that the weapons with which the enlisted men are armed are in such a condition as to injure their effectiveness for battle.

There can be no question that the militia has failed us whenever we have attempted to employ it in military operations; but it is often urged that the National Guard of to-day is not the militia of our past history, and that a great change has supervened since the passage of the militia law of 1903. The facts which I have cited do not indicate, however, that the difference between the militia of to-day and that of our past history can be very great.

As a whole the militia is intimately bound up with the local politics of the various States. In each State it is directly administered by an official—the adjutant general—whose tenure of office ceases with the party in power, and whose interests are primarily political. It is this official to whom we must look for the administration of the expenditure of the funds which will be appropriated under the provisions of the bill under discussion. His responsibility is not to the United States, and his tenure of office is independent of the Federal Government.

The bill of the committee proposes to remedy the existing deficiencies by means of Federal pay, amounting in the case of enlisted men to one-fourth the rate of Regular Army pay. I think that it is more than doubtful whether this provision will accomplish the object. The pay in the case of privates will amount to about $45 per year. This is too small a sum to constitute a serious inducement to the individual man; it is too great, in the aggregate, in comparison with the results that will accrue to the United States.

Some idea can be formed as to the probable effect of Federal pay by comparing the results now obtained in the States which pay their troops with those in which no pay is given. During the year 1914 seven States paid sums varying from 25 cents to $1 for each attendance at assemblies for drill. The average attendance at drill in these States was not above the general average of all States and was much below that of many other States in which no pay was given.

The United States, with a population of about 92,000,000, has on paper a force of about 122,000 Organized Militia, or 1,324 citizen soldiers for each million of population.

The United Kingdom, with a population of about 41,000,000, had before the beginning of the present war 317,000 citizen soldiers, none of whom were paid. This means 7,770 citizen soldiers to each million of population. If the young men of the United States would enlist in the same relative numbers as the young men of Great Britain, we could have a citizen soldiery of 714,622 men.

The Dominion of Canada, with a population of a little more than 7,000,000, had a national citizen soldiery of about 64,000 men, none of whom were paid. If our young men should enlist in the same relative numbers, we should have a force of about 826,000 men.

Before compulsory training was put into effect, Australia, with a population of about 4,455,000, had a partially trained citizen soldiery of about 88,000, none of whom were paid. If our young men should enlist in the same relative numbers, we should have 1,802,651 citizen soldiers.

We can not build an efficient national defense upon a force thus constituted. If our citizen soldiery is to be made effective, it must be nationalized. And the present Organized Militia can not be nationalized by an enactment which attempts to legislate around the plain provisions of the Constitution.

The main defect in the committee's bill consists in basing our national defense upon the militia system. But many provisions in regard to the Regular Army are equally open to objection.

The most prominent of these objectionable features is, perhaps, the provision legislating for a return to the permanent-staff system which broke down so lamentably in 1898. Prior to the Spanish-American War the staff departments of the Army were administered by a permanent personnel. Its interests were apart from those of the Army, and staff officers were unfamiliar with the needs of the Army and its requirements for war service. Absorbed in administrative routine, they grew to look upon the Army as an institution which existed for the purpose of peace administration by the staff bureaus. This condition of affairs is well illustrated by the naive complaint of the Quartermaster General in 1898, which has become classic in Army circles, that just as he had succeeded in getting his department in good working order the war came along and upset it completely. It is difficult to form an idea of the complete incompetence of the staff departments to fulfill their function during the Spanish-American War. Perhaps it is most strikingly manifested in the arrangements for the embarkation of the expeditionary force to Cuba. The following is part of a description of that operation by the lieutenant colonel of the First Volunteer Cavalry:

> It was the evening of June 7 when we suddenly received orders that the expedition was to start from Port Tampa, 9 miles distant by rail, at daybreak the following morning, and that if we were not aboard our transport by that time we could not go. As the number and capacity of the transports were known, or ought to have been known, and as the number and size of the regiments to go were also known, the task of allotting each regiment to its proper transport and arranging that the regiments and transports should meet in due order on the dock ought not to have been difficult. However, no arrangements were made in advance, and we were allowed to shove and hustle for ourselves as best we could, on much the same principles that had governed our preparations hitherto.
> We were ordered to be at a certain track with all our baggage at midnight, there to take a train for Port Tampa. At the appointed time we turned up, but the train did not. The men slept heavily while I and other officers wandered about in search of information which no one would give. We now and then came across a brigadier general or even a major general, but nobody knew anything. Some regiments got aboard the trains and some did not, but as none of the trains started this made little difference. At 3 o'clock we received orders to march to an entirely different track, and away we went. No train appeared on this track, either, but at 6 o'clock some coal cars came by, and these we seized. By various arguments we persuaded the engineer in charge of the train to back us down the 9 miles to Port Tampa, where we arrived, covered with coal dust but with our belongings.
> The railway tracks ran out on the quay, and the transports, which had been anchored in mid-stream, were gradually being brought up alongside the quay and loaded. The trains were unloading wherever they happened to be, no attention whatever being paid to the possible position of the transport on which the soldiers were to go. Col. Wood and I jumped off and started on a hunt, which soon convinced us that we had our work cut out if we were to get a transport at all. From the highest general down, nobody could tell us where to go to find out what transport we were to have. At last we were informed that we were to hunt up the depot quartermaster, Col. Humphrey. We found his office, where his assistant informed us that he didn't know where the colonel was, but believed him to be asleep upon one of the transports. This seemed odd at such a time, but so many of the methods in vogue were so odd that we were quite prepared to accept it as a fact.
> At last, however, after over an hour's industrious and rapid search through a swarming ant heap of humanity, I found Col. Humphrey and was allotted a transport—the Yucatan. She was out in mid-stream, so Wood seized a stray launch and boarded her. At the same time I happened to find out that she had previously been allotted to two other regiments—the Second Regular Infantry and the Seventy-first New York Volunteers—which latter regiment alone contained more men than could be put aboard her. Accordingly I ran at full speed to our train, and leaving a strong guard with the baggage I double-quicked the rest of the regiment up to the boat just in time to board her as she came into the quay and then to hold her against the Second Regulars and the Seventy-first who had arrived a little too late, being a shade less ready than we were in the matter of individual initiative.
> There was a good deal of expostulation, but we had possession; and as the ship could not contain half of the men who had been told to go aboard of her, the Seventy-first went away, as did all but four companies of the Second. Meanwhile a general had caused our train to be unloaded at the end of the quay farthest from where the ship was; and the hungry, tired men spent most of the day in the labor of bringing down their baggage and the food and ammunition.
> * * * The travel rations which had been issued to the men were not sufficient, because the meat was very bad indeed. If we had been given canned corn beef, we would have been all right, but instead of this the soldiers were issued horrible stuff called "canned fresh beef." There was no salt in it. At the best it was stringy and tasteless; at the worst it was nauseating. Not one-fourth of it was ever eaten at all, even when the men became very hungry. There were no facilities for the men to cook anything. There was no ice for them; the water was not good; and they had no fresh meat or fresh vegetables.

Contrast this pell-mell embarkation under the permanent staff administration with the smooth handling of the Vera Cruz expeditionary force in 1914, as carried out under the detailed system.

One of the first reforms resulting from the experiences of the Spanish-American War was the act of February 2, 1901, by which the permanent staff system was abandoned and detail system of officers of line who were to return periodically to duty with troops was instituted. It is now, in effect, proposed to return to the permanent system by permitting continuous service of officers in the staff departments. The lessons of the Spanish-American War are no longer fresh in our minds, but they must not be forgotten. The return to the permanent-staff system would be a step of a most retrogressive nature.

But it is not alone in respect to the return to permanent-staff system that the legislation in regard to the staff departments is objectionable. The bill proposes to place a premium upon staff service by permitting of the detail of a line officer to the staff corps with increase of rank. The effect of this provision will naturally be to discount service with troops with consequent injury to the efficiency of such service. Now there can be no higher function in the military establishment than the command of troops. Any legislative provision which encourages officers to abandon such service is pernicious in the highest degree.

A further defect in the formulation of the bill is to be found in the provisions regarding the increase of the Medical Corps. The number of majors provided for that corps is greater than that provided for the Infantry, which constitutes the bulk of a modern army; the number of lieutenant colonels of the Medical Corps is twice as great as that provided for the Cavalry and two and one-half times the number provided for the Field Artillery; the number of colonels is greater than for either the Cavalry or Field Artillery. The total number of medical officers provided is five times the proportion which they bear to the other arms in any other army in the world. There can be no excuse for providing for an excess of medical officers over our peace necessities, for the Medical Corps is the one branch of service for which skilled officers can be obtained from civil life on the outbreak of war.

There is, finally, one further feature of the proposed bill that should not be passed over without close scrutiny. That is the provision for the promotion of officers of the combatant arms of the service.

Under present laws on the subject advancement is by seniority in each arm of the service. Officers are advanced as vacancies occur by retirements, deaths, and resignations, or by legislative increases in the arm of the service to which the officer belongs. In times past increases in the different arms of the service have been made in a haphazard fashion, and this has resulted in wide discrepancies in the promotion of officers who entered the service at the same time. For example, officers who entered the service in 1887 range in rank from major to colonel; those who entered in 1902, from first lieutenant to major, depending on the arm of the service. Officers who have served as instructors at West Point have had the fortune upon returning to their regiments to find themselves junior to youngsters who a few years before had been under their instruction as cadets. These differences in rank are not due to any merit upon the part of the officers promoted, but are solely due to the accidents of congressional legislation. Naturally, these discriminations are humiliating to the older and more mature officers who find themselves, without any fault on their own part, in a position where they may have to receive orders from young and inexperienced men.

This system, or rather lack of system, of advancement is prejudicial to the interests of the Government in that it imposes responsibilities upon relatively immature men that require the sober judgment of matured experience. In no other army in the world does this pernicious system of advancement prevail. An efficient army under such a system is an impossibility, for promotion is the very life of the officer corps, and efficient service can not be expected from officers who have become discouraged and indifferent through an arbitrary advancement of their juniors over their heads.

The proposed bill aggravates the present inequalities in promotion. When put into effect in its entirety the resulting promotions, so I am informed, will be as follows:

All lieutenant colonels and one major of Field Artillery will become colonels; only 4 out of 21 lieutenant colonels of Cavalry will become colonels; and only 17 out of 39 lieutenant colonels of Infantry will become colonels. All majors of Field Artillery will become lieutenant colonels, while only 6 out of 61 majors of Cavalry and 31 out of 122 majors of Infantry will be promoted. All first lieutenants, second lieutenants, and additional second lieutenants of Field Artillery will become captains, leaving 4 vacancies in the grade of captain, while 86 out of 246 first lieutenants of Cavalry and 359 out of 501 first lieutenants of Infantry will be promoted. These discrepancies are enormous. The officer who will be the junior colonel of Field Artillery entered the service in 1890, the junior colonel of Cavalry in 1878, and the junior colonel of Infantry in 1884. There will thus be a difference of 12 years in the period required to reach the grade of colonel in the different arms. The officer who will be the junior lieutenant colonel of Field Artillery entered the service in 1898, the junior lieutenant colonel of Cavalry in 1886, the junior lieutenant colonel of Infantry in 1889. There will again be 12 years' difference in the time required to reach the grade of lieutenant colonel. The officer who will be the junior major of Field Artillery entered the service in 1901, the junior major of Cavalry in 1892, and the junior major of Infantry in 1896. There will thus be a difference of nine years in the time required to reach the grade of major. The officer who will be the junior captain of Field Artillery is yet to be commissioned; the officer who will be the junior captain of Cavalry entered the service in 1901 and the junior captain of Infantry in 1905. There will thus be a difference of 15 years in the time required to reach the grade of captain.

Under a system of promotion by seniority, the only just method of advancement is in accordance with length of service. The law should specify the number of years which an officer should serve in each grade, and he should, if qualified, be promoted after having served for that period and not before. This is the principle of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], which conserves the interests of the Government by insuring the necessary years of service and experience for the higher grades and that of the individual officer by giving him a position commensurate with his service.

To sum up the defects of the proposed bill:

First. Under the guise of a fictitious federalization it fastens on the country the system of State troops which has failed us in the past and gives little assurance of better performance in the future;

Second. It carries an expenditure for the pay of officers and enlisted men out of all proportion to the service rendered;

Third. Reestablishes the permanent staff system which was proven disastrously inefficient in the Spanish-American War; and Fourth. Provides a system of promotion adverse to the efficiency of the service and injurious to the prospects of the great body of Army officers.

On the other hand, the sum total of immediate provision for a better national defense amounts to an increase of 10,000 men in the Regular Army. This is the measure of the response which the committee proposes to make to the present demand for preparedness.

I am heartily in favor of increasing the Regular Army, and shall therefore cheerfully vote for the Kahn amendment which will make the Regular Army 220,000 men. Warfare has changed and will continue to change, and it requires more training to adapt the citizen soldiery to the new methods of warfare. We must have trained and disciplined men more today than in any other period in our history. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of a very material increase in the Army and Navy for the defense of the country, and I have persistently voted for all measures which would keep us upon a solid basis for the defense of the American people in time of war. I believe that the larger portion of the money available should be expended on the Navy, our first line of defense.

I realize that the increase of the Army to 140,000 would not alone be sufficient, but when we take into consideration the other provisions made in the bill it can readily be seen that the increase is far in excess of 140,000 men and that the reserves, the National Guard, and trained men of the country would give us over a million soldiers, a footing sufficiently large for the beginning of a defense movement.

The bill, in addition to providing the Regular Army increase, also provides a manner for the federalization of the National Guard, which now contains 129,000 men. This National Guard I feel will very materially increase, now that it is recognized by the National Government in this bill; and not only will it increase in numbers, but in efficiency and work, because it will be financially improved by having Government aid. This in itself upon the present footing would give us 269,000 men, all trained, equipped, and ready for immediate call.

The National Guard has not had a fair chance during past years. It has continued under adverse circumstances, and yet it has maintained a splendid standing and done good work. Now that it is to become a part of the national defense, I look for even greater things from this strong organization.

I am a great believer in our citizen soldier. I want to see the National Guard much enlarged, its duties and efficiency for immediate service strengthened and extended. Let us have a large National Guard; more schools and colleges with requisite military training.

Let the youth of the land be taught what authority means and give them proper and sufficient military training. It can do them no harm and will greatly strengthen the ability of the country to defend itself in time of need and make them better citizens.

The increase of the Army to 140,000 men or to 220,000 men would be very small indeed if the time should arise when we need a larger Army. It will not only be an Army of this size we shall need but one of a million troops or more. It will be necessary for us to largely depend upon the National Guard as we have always depended upon it in the past and upon the volunteer soldiers. Let us see, therefore, that this organization and our young men are given proper military training so that they can render efficient service at short notice side by side with the Regular Army should necessity arise, and that we may be able to quickly mobilize an army of soldiers trained in the arts of war not alone in the Regular Army, but also in the National Guard and in the schools and colleges.

In addition to the National Guard under the reserve law now in operation there will be maintained a reserve of some 60,000. There are 27,000 men in the Regular Army discharged each year on account of the expiration of service, and from the National Guard for the same reason some 39,000. From this source we obtain, in addition to the regular reserves, 270,000 who have passed through the Army in the last 10 years, and 395,000 who have passed through the National Guard in the same time.

We have also young men passed through the military schools and colleges of the country during every year, making 330,000 of these young men who have had military training in the last 10 years. I find from these figures that there are 995,000, in round numbers, men of military age now in the country who have had military training.

If we would therefore take the 140,000 provided in this bill for the Regular Army, 60,000 for the reserve of the Regular Army, 129,000 in the National Guard, and the 995,790 men trained in the country, we have 1,324,790 men who are qualified to take up the duties of a soldier at any moment, so that while the 140,000 men of the Regular Army might seem small in comparison to what we really demand, yet when we take these figures presented by the report upon this bill, we feel safe in the more than 1,300,000 ready for service.

I feel that the Army and the men qualified for service should be sufficiently large to meet the first shock in the event of war. War does not come as in years gone by—after long talking and diplomatic relations—but it appears to come like a thunderclap from the clear sky and when least expected. I feel, therefore, that we should provide both in our Army and Navy adequate men and ships for the defense of the land. With our country of 100,000,000 people, rich in soil, in manufacture, and in commerce, we ought to be able, without much burden upon the individual, to maintain adequate defense of the land. Our people should feel that the United States Congress has provided them sufficient protection under those clauses of the Constitution which empower Congress to raise and support armies and to provide and maintain a Navy. The various States under the Constitution vested in the National Government this power and authority, and the people look to Congress to perform its duty in such manner that they will be absolutely safe from foreign intervention.

I should have been willing to vote for a larger standing army than the one provided, but the committee must have approached this matter from every angle, and, having confidence in the committee, I am willing to stand by its recommendations. [Applause.]

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, the Kahn amendmnet authorizes the President to enlist 80,000 men in addition to the number named in the bill. It is difficult for us to realize the difference between 143,000 and 220,000, and the size of the Army as it is to-day can be best understood by concrete examples of what it is unable to do.

The place where the Niagara River empties into Lake Ontario has been considered from days previous to the founding of the Republic as a strategically important point. The French built a fort there when the place was a part of their possessions. This has been maintained and added to from that day to this. Until two years ago it was garrisoned. Our Army, however, is so small that as soon as the necessity arose of policing the Mexican border no troops were left for Fort Niagara, and since then the fort and the Government property have been in the hands of a few caretakers.

Another most important post along the frontier between us and Canada is Buffalo, one of the largest of our cities, at the foot of Lake Erie. Buffalo has grown to be a city of half a million people, with vast interests of all kinds; with a great harbor, which receives the great grain shipments of the great West; with many railroads, forming a connecting point between the East and the West; with great manufactories of many kinds, including one of the great steel plants of the country; and with commercial interests of almost every kind. Fort Porter, too, has been denuded of troops since trouble arose on the Mexican border.

So we find that with slight friction, without war, our Army is unable to garrison the most important strategic points on our border.

It has been urged that preparation for defense is unnecessary because the nations of Europe are exterminating each other. In this country the North and the South faced one another in armed conflict for four years. At the end of that period the armies of the North paraded in this city, previous to their disbandment, and expert opinion is that the armies of the North and the South after this long conflict contained the greatest number of thorough soldiers and the best trained soldiers ever seen on this continent. So it will be found at the end of the European war that the nations of Europe will have more soldiers and better soldiers than they have ever had in their previous history. Little Canada alone, our neighbor on the north, whom we adjoin from ocean to ocean, will soon have half a million men in this conflict, and the account of the progress of the war shows that its soldiers are as intrepid, as resolute, and as daring as any who are engaged in the contest.

It has been urged by Members of this Chamber that we are more likely to become engaged in war with Great Britain than with Germany. If this be a true prophecy, about which I express no opinion, how will the United States be prepared, with an Army of 143,000, when Canada, one of the many dependencies of Great Britain, has a thoroughly trained, well-equipped army of 500,000 men, who will have all the confidence in themselves which can come only from participating in a great war?

It is urged, too, that there is no need of preparation, because Europe is too much engaged in its own struggle. The time when pestilence is abroad is when contagion need be feared. The world is so intimately connected that what affects one part of it is very apt to spread to another.

Gentlemen urge, too, that strengthening the Army is apt to breed war; that men who are trained will be apt to say that their training has been useless unless they can have an armed conflict. What is true of us is true of others, and the rest of the world is to-day an armed camp, with which our interests are in constant conflict. While we all pray for peace, this conflict of interests may at any time, with those opposed to us thoroughly prepared, lead to a trial of arms.

With all these considerations in mind, I shall vote for the Kahn amendment, and I would gladly vote for a still greater increase and to have the Army recruited much more rapidly than this bill provides.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I am very heartily in favor of the adoption of this amendment. I am in favor of it not on account of considerations for the future but on account of considerations that are here to-day. Gentlemen on the other side of this question who suggest that we should increase the Army 40,000 are inclined to suggest that there exists no immediate need for a larger increase. Why place it at 40,000? Does that measure the difference between the greatest and mightiest Nation of the world unprepared and helpless and open to the attack of nations great and big the world over and such a Nation adequately prepared to meet its national obligations? I say no. When we add only 40,000 to all arms of the service we are making but a shadow of preparedness.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can not yield. If I had more time I would.

The Nation—the people of America—is asking Congress for an adequate Military Establishment, that we may protect our honor, that we may protect our citizens, that we may protect the integrity of the Nation itself. Is a paltry army corps that with which you are going to respond? They have asked us for bread, and are we not giving them a stone?

Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that the proposed amendment simply is a limitation. Well and good; in one sense it is, but it is a limitation beyond 140,000. It says that the number of the Army can be increased to 220,000 if the situation requires it, if Congress shall first appropriate the money in order that the increase may be made. There is not a man here who can not look into the future far enough to see that the hour may come quickly and sharply—when Congress is not in session—when the President will want the power to increase the Regular Army of the United States until we have a fighting force somewhere. [Applause.] The present law authorizes 100,000 men, but at no time for a period of many years has there been more than about three-fourths of that number actually in the service. By raising the limit to the point proposed we will have an efficient force fairly reasonable in its proportions.

Mr. Chairman, an 80,000 increase may look large to some men who can not look the country and its interests all over, but when you measure the needs of the hour the proposed increase is small. By the bill you increase not by a single troop the 15 Cavalry regiments of our Army, and to-day, when we are making war upon but a man, we have not a sufficient Cavalry force to do the work. Mr. Chairman, more than 50 years ago, on the field of Gettysburg, 300 cannon belched forth their fire. The proposed bill doubles the 6 regiments of Artillery. The Artillery, as it stands to-day—6 regiments, 4 men to a battery, 6 batteries to a regiment, making 144 guns in all—and the bill you propose to give to the country that they may have adequate preparedness gives 288 guns only, not enough to sweep a single sector at Verdun [applause]; not as many as thundered at a single battle in a war half a century gone by. Artillery decides the battle issues of to-day. Instead of 12 regiments we should have at least 24.

Yesterday an effort was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] to increase the Coast Artillery Corps. This bill increases that branch of the service by some 5,200 men. The gentleman insisted, and with reason, that a further increase of about 5,000 men is needed to man the fortifications already constructed. In recent years increased demands have been made upon the Coast Artillery. Panama and Hawaii alone will about absorb the increase authorized in this bill. There is no doubt in my mind that any scheme that will adequately prepare our country for defense must increase the Coast Artillery beyond that carried in this bill.

So, Mr. Chairman, existing needs require that we increase the Military Establishment more than this bill contemplates. We have of late been humiliated by the trampling upon our rights on land and sea of powers great and small. Americans who have their country's interest at heart demand that these days of humiliation shall end. They are determined that the Stars and Stripes shall be raised high and kept there; that the flag shall protect in life, property, and rights every person who owes it allegiance.

The first requisite to this national program, which in every respect has my hearty support, is a Regular Army reasonably ample for the country's needs. If this proposed amendment be adopted opportunity will then exist to bring the various branches of the service up to a state of reasonable adequacy.

Mr. HAY. I desire to say to the gentleman from California that I have only one speech on this side.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, it is my intention to say by my vote rather than by my words what I believe in regard to this amendment. I now wish to speak just a word to those Members on this side who have attacked this bill rather sharply this morning and to put this proposition to my friends like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], and others who have spoken. If they were confronted with the proposition to vote either for a bill that would give us an army of 140,000 men or a bill that would give a maximum army of 100,000 men, which would they vote for? That is the proposition upon which they would be called upon to vote if this bill came to a final vote in the form that it is now. So it is not a question of whether they would have it larger, but the question is, Is this bill as far as it goes better than the law which it proposes to supplant? Between these two propositions I think there can be no question that they would give their votes to the increase to 140,000 men rather than no increase at all. When they speak of the bill being a joke, they speak of it in comparison with what they would perhaps have it if they were writing the bill, but unfortunately they are not writing the bill. There are some 430 other Members who are taking a part in writing the bill, and we must arrive at a conclusion upon which a majority can stand.

I for one favor a larger number than the bill reported provides for. I was in favor of this same number when it was proposed in the committee and I shall stand for it in this amendment, because I think it is a step in the right direction. However, if it is not adopted, I shall also stand for the bill as reported, because I think it is good as far as it goes in this direction. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have been one of the pacifists, I believe, properly so called. I do not think I am overly excitable by nature or apt to indulge in hysteria by fear, but I never have addressed the House before under a greater sense of responsibility for my country than I feel now. What is the situation? A year ago last December, after the European war had been in progress for some months, the President of the United States informed the Congress that in his opinion at that time there was no practical need of an increase in the Regular Army. The President of the United States last fall announced publicly that he thought there should be an increase. He invited the leader of the opposition in the House and the leader of the opposition in the Senate in a conference, expressing the hope that the question of the preparedness of this country might be considered as an emergency matter, free from partisanship. In January he made a tour of the country urging the country to get in a better position of preparedness for international trouble. It was a situation growing out of the European war. The President, dealing with the delicate questions involving this country with foreign countries, had reached the deliberate opinion that there ought to be something done in the way of preparation. He took the very unusual course, almost unexampled, of making speeches in different parts of the country in order to bring the attention of the people home to this subject, not as a matter of a permanent policy of the Army in time of peace, but as an emergency matter in the face of possible international complications. Now, what has he received therefor? This bill authorizes an increase in the Regular Army of 10,000 in the next 15 months. The President was asking preparation now as an emergency matter. In view of complications which might arise, and probably would arise, we propose to respond to them by adding 10,000 men—that is all—in the next 15 months.

Does anybody call that preparation? And then, we will add 10,000 more in the next 12; 10,000 more in the next 12 months; and 10,000 more in the next 12 months. And if the President be correct in his estimates of the matter, we will be adding men for an emergency some three or four years after the emergency has arisen and has passed away. [Applause.]

The bill is brought before this House as an emergency matter, setting aside other bills which have been promised prior consideration. Well, adding 10,000 men in the next 15 months is a matter of very little importance. We authorized 20,000 men to be added the other day by a resolution which never had been introduced and without debate. Here is the response we are making to the request of the President to add 10,000 men in 15 months—40,000 men in four years and a quarter.

The amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] permits the President, in his discretion, to add 80,000 more men. If I had my way about it, I would make it a requirement at this time to drill these boys now so that if danger should arise they will have been drilled in advance. But all the Kahn amendment does is to remove the limitation of 140,000 in the bill and permit the President to add in his discretion 80,000 more. Under the terms of the bill the President, if he declares that war is imminent, can bring the regiments up to their full strength. But when danger arises, and negotiations are going on with a foreign country, it is of itself a delicate situation for the President by proclamation to declare that war is imminent. At such a time a declaration that war is immiment is practically a declaration of war. But if we confer upon the President the discretion that is proposed here he can and, I believe in view of the existing international situation, will bring the Army up to this strength.

Gentlemen say it can not be done, and, therefore, they are opposed to trying it. I can remember when gentlemen on the floor said at the time we had a Regular Army of only 25,000, during my service here, that you could not increase it because you could not get the men to enlist. We never have failed to get the men to enlist. We never have failed to keep the Regular Army up to the highest point allowed by the President under his orders. And to say that we can not get the men is to write our countrymen down as pusillanimous cowards. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 11 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, in what has been said here to-day what the bill does has been lost sight of. The bill provides for an Army in time of peace of 140,000 men, and according to the statement made by The Adjutant General of the Army in time of war it can be expanded to 207,000 men. That is what the bill does so far as the Regular Army is concerned. But gentlemen say that is no preparedness. The bill does not stop there. It provides for a federalized National Guard, which may be raised to 425,000 men. Training for the youth of the country is provided for. Much legislation is proposed which will aid us in time of war. I know that some gentlemen believe that you can not get anything out of the National Guard and that it is idle to rely upon it. But in every war in which this country has participated the militia and the National Guard have always responded, and through their efforts and through their courage victory has perched upon our banners. [Applause.] And if it did so then it will do so now, and will do so in the future.

Gentlemen talk about emergency. Emergency? Why, my friends, does anybody presume that if an emergency arose 220,000 men would meet it? If we had an emergency it would take a million men, not 220,000. And what are you proposing? You are proposing an army of 220,000 men, which will not meet an emergency, to keep it up in time of peace, and to have the people of this country pay taxes to maintain an army which they can not in the first place get and which, in the second place, they can not use. [Applause.]

Now, if that is true, what is the virtue of this amendment? What is the purpose of this amendment? What is the reason for it? Why, gentlemen, I can tell you the reason for it. Everybody in this country realizes that it is impossible to recruit under the volunteer system an army of 220,000 men or of 200,000 men. And the people of this country who are agitating the question of preparedness, who want us to sacrifice the traditions of this country, the history of this country, the best interests of our people, to the idea that somebody is about to invade us, these people who are stirring up all this agitation and who seem to have a mint of money to make it with, want you to have enacted into law a provision for 220,000 men in order that they may demonstrate to the country that they can not be raised under the volunteer system, and then they want to come to us and say, "You must put into operation compulsory military service in this country." [Applause.]

Why do I say that? Here is this letter which we all received this morning, signed by this great military expert, Mr. S. Stanwood Menken, who, I dare say, does not know the difference between a battery and a troop, and who never saw a squadron in the field, but he comes and tells us that we must defeat this bill because it is unscientific and does not give enough men, because, he says, the military experts of this country have not been followed in framing it. My friends, if we undertook to follow the military experts of this country in making up military bills, we would have a thousand bills in this House for your consideration instead of one. Why, every one of them has a plan; every one of them has a different idea about these things. And ever since I have been on the Military Committee, a period of 19 years, that committee has had to work out its own salvation, because it never got any help from the military experts in this country in working out a practical scheme. [Applause.]

Now, my friends, I wish you would pay attention to this part of this remarkable communication. It says in part:

As I am writing to you, I take the liberty of calling your attention to one other fact, the result of experience before vast audiences, and that is that I found not only here but in the West that they approve with practical unanimity the idea of universal obligatory training of the youth of our land. They recognize that it is a democratic way of obtaining a people's army; that it renders militarism impossible; that it will add to individual efficiency; it will bring understanding among the classes and add life and health to the people, who will receive an endowment of patriotism through service to their country otherwise unobtainable.

That is the meat in this matter; that is what these people are going after. They are maintaining a vast organization throughout this country; they are employing agents everywhere in order to carry on their program to bring about compulsory military service in this country.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes; I will.

Mr. GARDNER. I notice the gentleman twice says "compulsory military service." That is rather different than compulsory military training, is it not?

Mr. HAY. I would like the gentleman to explain the difference.

Mr. GARDNER. Compulsory military service is compulsory military service in time of war. I believe in a volunteer army in time of war, but I believe in compulsory military training.

Mr. HAY. I think everybody understands that the gentleman from Massachusetts has simply stated what is the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum.

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, no.

Mr. HAY. Well, if compulsory military training is not service, I do not know what it is, whether in time of war or time of peace. It does not make a particle of difference.

Some gentleman talked about the defense of our institutions and said that we had to have these 220,000 men in order to defend our institutions. Who is attacking the institutions of this country? What nation on earth is attacking them? My friends, there is not a country on earth to-day that has any idea of making war upon the United States. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] talked about international complications. I tell you that the signs of the times in Europe point now to the fact that peace is beginning to hover over that country. [Applause.] Out of the roar of the cannon, out of the smoke of battle which hangs over Verdun, there appears a ray of hope for early peace in that country. And when peace comes, what will gentlemen say to their people—gentlemen who have voted to saddle upon their people 220,000 soldiers, men who will not be used for any purpose, people who will cost an immense amount of money?

And, after all, if an emergency should arise, we should have to depend now, as in the past, upon the volunteers of this country and upon the National Guard. We would have to depend upon them, and if you had those 220,000 men authorized, in my judgment you would not add anything to the real defense of the country, but you would provide something which is against the best interests of our people and in favor of taxation which we can escape, which we do not want and do not need. I am as much in favor of having this country prepared for any emergency as anybody else, but I am not in favor of being carried off my feet by the National Security League and people of that sort, who are carrying on this propaganda, not for the purpose of really preparing the country in time of emergency but for their own ends. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Amendment offered by the committee: Strike out lines 1 to 4, page 14, and insert the following:

"That the Medical Corps shall consist of one Surgeon General, with the rank of major general, during the active service of the present incumbent and thereafter he shall have the rank of brigadier general of the Medical Department, and commissioned officers of the several inferior grades, proportionally distributed among the same as in the Medical Corps now established by law, the total number of whom shall approximately be equal to, but not exceed except as hereinafter provided, 7 for every 1,000 of the total enlisted strength of the Army authorized from time to time by law: Provided further, That if by reason of a reduction by law in the authorized enlisted strength of the Army aforesaid the total number of officers in the Medical Corps commissioned previously to such reduction shall for the time being exceed the equivalent of 7 to 1,000 of such reduced enlisted strength no original appointment to commissioned rank in said corps shall be made until the total number of commissioned officers thereof shall have been reduced below the equivalent of seven to the thousand of the said reduced enlisted strength, nor thereafter so as to make the total number of commissioned officers thereof in excess of the equivalent of seven to the thousand of said reduced enlisted strength; and no promotion shall be made above the grade of captain in said corps until the number of officers in the grade above that of captain to which the promotion is due shall have been reduced below the proportional number authorized for such grade on the basis of the reduced enlisted strength, nor thereafter so as to make the number of officers in such grade in excess of the proportional number authorized on the basis of said reduced enlisted strength: Provided further, That when in time of war the Regular Army is increased by virtue of the provisions of this or any other act, the medical officers appointed to meet such increase shall be mustered out of the service of the United States when the reduction of the enlisted strength of the Army shall take place: And provided further, That relative rank among captains and lieutenants in the Medical Corps, who have or shall have attained that rank by operation of law after a period of service fixed thereby, shall be determined by counting all the service rendered by them as officers in said corps and as assistant surgeons in the Regular Army, subject, however, to loss of files by reason of sentence of court-martial or by reason of failure to pass examination for promotion."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the chairman of the committee kindly explain what is the effect of this amendment, and particularly whether the proportion of 7 to 1,000 is a larger ratio than now exists in the present establishment?

Mr. HAY. The purpose of this amendment is to give the Medical Corps of the Army 7 officers to every 1,000 enlisted men. That proportion is greater than the present one, and it is a proportion which the Surgeon General of the Army recommended to the committee as being, in his opinion, sufficient to meet any demand which may arise.

The amendment is so drawn that as the Army goes up in strength the Medical Corps goes up in strength and if the Army decreases in strength the Medical Corps will decrease in strength. It is what may be called a shifting scale.

Mr. STAFFORD. But you always will have 7 medical officers to 1,000 enlisted men?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the ratio at present?

Mr. HAY. I think it is 5.7.

Mr. KAHN. It is 5.32.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has it been demonstrated that the present quota is not sufficient in time of peace to meet the emergencies of the Army?

Mr. HAY. I think it has. I think in a bill of this character we ought to see to it that we provide medical officers sufficient to meet any emergency which may arise, and if we do give the Medical Corps a few more men than they actually need, why, we are not throwing money away in that respect.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, if the gentleman will permit, in the bill as submitted the Secretary of War had authority in time of war to increase the Medical Corps.

Mr. HAY. Not the Medical Corps. He had authority to increase the enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, but not the officers.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many additional officers will this increase the Medical Corps?

Mr. HAY. If there are 100,000 men it will be an increase of 257 officers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Ranging from second lieutenants up?

Mr. HAY. Ranging from first lieutenants.

Mr. STAFFORD. From first lieutenants up?

Mr. HAY. There are no second lieutenants in the Medical Corps.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I was not sure, but as I caught the reading of the amendment, it does not seem to fit in exactly with the part of the bill which is not amended. If I am right, the amendment moves to strike out all of lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, on page 14.

Mr. HAY. Down to the word "provided."

Mr. SHERLEY. It was not so reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be modified.

Mr. HAY. Strike out all of lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, down to the word provided.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia as a committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, in line 4, after the word "Provided," I move to insert the word "further."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 4, after the word "Provided" insert the word "further."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. On line 12, page 14, after the word "be," I move to insert the words "detailed or."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 12, after the word "be" insert the words "detailed or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech made by my colleague Mr. MCCULLOCH on the 12th of February last.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech made by his colleague Mr. MCCULLOCH on the 12th of February last. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BENNET: Page 13, section 8, insert, after line 26, the following:

"There shall be established an auxiliary corps of the War Department, the same to be composed of all licensed officers and members of the crews of transports, mine planters, cable boats, and harbor boats of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, also superintending engineers of the Quartermaster's Department, all of which shall have at the time of the enactment of this bill served at least five years in the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, the Navy, or Coast Survey, these men to be enrolled in the same rank and at the same rate of pay they receive at the enactment of this bill, the officers to receive a warrant from the Secretary of War and the same allowance as received by warrant officers in the Navy, all previous service in the Quartermaster's Department, the Navy, or Coast Survey to count as continuous service in this corps."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I showed this amendment to the chairman of the committee, and he said at that time that he saw no objection to it. The amendment speaks for itself. It adds a new corps to the War Department, to be composed of licensed officers and the members of the crews of transports, mine planters, cable boats, and harbor boats. I might say that the experience of the European war has demonstrated that these men ought to be under military control and direction. In connection with one of the nations, at least, they found serious difficulty because they had no control over the captains and officers of the transports and such auxiliary boats. They were civilians. These men perform military duty, and this puts them on the same basis as those who perform military duty and as men who are provided for in this section generally. I think that explains the amendment. I understand on the part of the committee that there is no particular opposition to it, and it serves the purpose that I have indicated.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does this auxiliary corps apply to anyone who has not served for five years?

Mr. BENNET. It does not.

Mr. MANN. Will it apply to anyone who serves hereafter five years but who has not served five years at the time of the enactment of the bill?

Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman mean some one in the service who has not served five years but afterwards serves five years?

Mr. MANN. Whether he is in the service now or goes in after.

Mr. BENNET. If there was any doubt about that, I would be perfectly willing to make it apply to them.

Mr. MANN. I was asking for information as to what it did do.

Mr. BENNET. I think the plain intention is that when a man reaches five years' limit he becomes a member of this corps.

Mr. MANN. Does it not say "served five years at the time of the passage of the act"?

Mr. BENNET (reading). "All of which shall have at the time of the enactment of this bill served at least five years in the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, the Navy, or Coast Survey."

Mr. MANN. Is it not intended by the amendment, by whoever prepared it, merely to give a certain status to a few men who are now serving in these various capacities, with no intention of putting any of them under military service in the future, but simply to get them on the retired pay roll?

Mr. BENNET. That can be easily remedied by inserting, after the word "bill," the words "or hereafter." I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that it is a good proposition——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not agree with me; I do not think it is a good proposition.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. Does this not provide that the pay shall not be increased?

Mr. BENNET. Neither the rank nor pay is increased by reason of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. It provides that it shall not be increased at all. If a man is a mate on a transport, under this amendment can he ever become a captain?

Mr. BENNET. He could become a captain by operation of existing laws other than this act.

Mr. MANN. But could he?

Mr. BENNET. It carries them at the same rank and the same rate of pay as they had at the enactment of the bill, but there is no language here that prohibits their being promoted under other statutes.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman from New York that when he talked with me I was in a hurry; but I observe that at the end of this proposed paragraph it is provided that these officers shall receive a warrant from the Secretary of War and the same allowance as is received by warrant officers of the Navy. Now, the warrant officers of the Navy receive a great deal more than these men now receive. I could not consent to that.

Mr. BENNET. Then let us strike that part out. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that, after the words "Secretary of War," the rest be stricken out.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman's amendment seeks to put these people under military authority, and they are now under civil authority?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks to modify his amendment by striking out all after the word "War" in the third line from the last. The Clerk will report the language stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the same allowance as received by warrant officers in the Navy, all previous service in the Quartermaster's Department, the Navy, or Coast Survey to count as continuous service in this corps.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask to further modify the amendment by adding, in the sixth line of the amendment, after the word "bill," the words "or hereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman also asks to modify the amendment by adding, after the word "bill," the words "or hereafter." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment read as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, section 8, insert after line 26 the following:

"There shall be established an auxiliary corps of the War Department, the same to be composed of all licensed officers and members of the crews of transports, mine planters, cable boats, and harbor boats of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, also superintending engineers of the Quartermaster's Department, all of which shall have at the time of the enactment of this bill or hereafter served at least five years in the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, the Navy, or Coast Survey. These men to be enrolled in the same rank and at the same rate of pay they receive at the enactment of this bill, the officers to receive a warrant from the Secretary of War."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mine planters are not under the Quartermaster's Department, they are under the Coast Artillery.

Mr. BENNET. I do not think the amendment says that they are under the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes; it does.

Mr. BENNET. I see the gentleman's point. I think the gentleman agrees with me that if these other officers are put on this status, the officers of the mine planters ought to be in the same status?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; but the gentleman has designated now mine planters which do not exist, because there is none under the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. BENNET. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to strike out the words "mine planters" wherever they now appear and put them in after the phrase "of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army."

Mr. SHERLEY. Under the Coast Artillery.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the amendment by striking out the words "mine planters" wherever they now occur and insert them after the word "Army," in line 4 of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment in the manner indicated?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] did not indicate who prepared this amendment, but I am quite confident that it was not prepared by the gentleman from New York, or it would not have required unanimous consent given so frequently to modify it. The purpose of the amendment is to give a military status to certain men who have not a military status now and who do not perform military duty, undoubtedly with the object of putting these men in the end upon the retired list as military men. Men who are soldiers get a certain preference from Congress and the Government by being eligible to a place on the retired list, on the theory that all of the time they are living they are taking the chance of being killed. But these men do not take that chance.

I am not in favor at this time of putting civilians in the service upon a retired status or of saying that we will call men soldiers who are not soldiers for the purpose of giving them a retired status. It is just as sure to follow as that the sun will rise to-morrow morning, if this amendment goes into the law, even with the modifications which have been made, that these men within a short time will be seeking, and in some way unknown to most of us will secure, not only the allowances that now go to equal ranks in the fighting end of the Navy, but will be placed on retired-status pay, and I do not think it ought to be done.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two or three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, this proposition first came to me originally from Capt. Bernard, of New York City. I sent it to the War Department, and the War Department drafted a bill which I introduced last January, H. R. 8044. I went over that bill with the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. There were certain things in the bill as drawn by the War Department which that gentleman did not think should be presented to the House in the shape in which they were.

Therefore they were stricken out, and the amendment as it remains is taken from the draft provided for me by the War Department. If section 8 will be read with even hasty care, it will be seen that there are rank after rank of men who, though performing some civilian duties, are very properly put upon the same status desired for these men, and with not such good reason, because there is nothing that ought to be under a military status more than a mine planter or a transport or a cable boat or these other auxiliaries that are mentioned, and the officers of the Army who have charge of those things ought to have the absolute right to be able to say to the captain of one of those boats, "You shall go here or there; you must do this or refrain from doing that"—and if they disobeyed to put them under court-martial, which they can not do now. All they can do now, if a man disobeys an order under the most strenuous circumstances is to discharge him, and sometimes that is exactly what the man would want.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Assuming the gentleman's purpose is correct, in what position would that leave the men on the United States Army Engineer boats? Are they included in the amendment?

Mr. BENNET. Yes; the superintendent of engineers in the Quartermaster's Department. The effort was not to include everybody on the boats, but simply those who had an intimate connection with the Military Establishment. People are in danger in doing this duty. It is only 10 days ago that a man in New York Harbor on one of these very boats transporting powder from fort to fort in the harbor of New York had his leg taken off. He is not enough of a military employee to get any damages from the Government on account of that, and he is too much of a military employee to get damages the other way, so that at the end of 30 days he automatically goes off the pay roll with nothing. It is a dangerous occupation and strictly military.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Coast Survey is referred to in the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. BENNET. That portion was stricken out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As the amendment stands now it applies to officers of the boats in the Quartermaster's Department only?

Mr. BENNET. Transports, cable boats, under the Quartermaster's Department, and mine planters, and also superintendent of engineers in the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman said that one reason for bringing these men into the service and putting them on a military status is that an officer may have direct military control over them.

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And that in case they refuse to obey an order, as it is now, he can do nothing more than to discharge them, whereas if they are under military control he can order them court-martialed. If that is true, what is gained in effectiveness? If you have to discharge a man who disobeys, you have lost his services, and if you have to court-martial him, you have lost his services.

Mr. BENNET. If a man is in a military force and he gets an order from his superior officer and knows that for disobedience he will be court-martialed, he is apt to obey. On the other hand, if he knows the only penalty is to lose his job, sometimes he is very willing to lose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BENNET) there were—ayes 14, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word merely for the purpose of putting some figures in the RECORD in connection with this Quartermaster Corps and the Hospital Corps which we have just been considering.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] said that The Adjutant General said the maximum strength of the Army under this bill would be 207,335 men. That is so; but The Adjutant General includes the Quartermaster Corps, 7,650, noncombatants; Hospital Corps, 9,873, noncombatants; Philippine Scouts, 12,000; cadets, 3,150; making 32,673 all told, which I think ought to be deducted. That leaves 174,662, not counting those elements.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the Signal Corps, exclusive of the aviation section thereof, shall consist of the commissioned officers now allowed by law, 47 master signal electricians, 155 first-class sergeants, 204 sergeants, 273 corporals, 32 cooks, 774 first-class privates, 233 privates; and the aviation section now authorized by law: Provided, That the number of aviation officers in said aviation section shall be increased by 73, and the number of aviation enlisted men shall be increased by 26 master signal electricians, 50 first-class sergeants, 93 sergeants, 171 corporals, 36 cooks, 250 first-class privates, 94 privates organized into an aviation-school detachment, and such number of aero squadrons as the Secretary of War may direct, not to exceed 7; and each aero squadron shall consist of such numbers of officers and enlisted men of the aviation section as the Secretary of War shall prescribe: Provided further, That hereafter married officers of the line of the Army shall be eligible for detail to aviation duty upon the same conditions that unmarried officers are now eligible for said duty; and the Secretary of War is authorized to have instructed in the art of flying as many enlisted men of the aviation section as he may deem necessary.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the very peculiar provisions of this section in a very important respect. Under this section the officers of the Signal Corps are not increased at all. By virtue of this provision there is an increase in the noncommissioned officers and the enlisted men of the Signal Corps proper of something over 1,000 men, but it was not seen fit to increase the officers at all. Now, I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that there is no corps of the Army, no division of the Army, that is so underofficered at the present time as the Signal Corps proper. I will go further and say that the General Staff and members of the War College have called attention to this particular matter, and I want to say there is not a department that needs more officers now or will need them in the future as much as the Signal Corps, and yet for some reason that I can not understand the officers of this corps are not increased at all. Mr. Chairman, I think there are few who understand or consider—it seems as if there must have been few who considered when this provision was written in this form—the manifold duties cast upon both the officers and men of the Signal Corps, and they need highly skilled men of the highest character of technical knowledge in order to properly manage this department. They carry on not only the telegraph but the telephone operations, the wireless telegraph, and the cable service, which means all the service which furnishes information to the Army. They are to a large extent the eyes of the Army and to a complete extent the ears of the Army. Information can only be obtained through the Signal Corps, and how are these enlisted men to be added to be trained? I suppose gentlemen will say by officers detailed from some other department, but an officer from some other department can not understand as fully and completely the duties which they would then be called upon to do as officers who had been trained in this particular division.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the provision on line 21, page 17, down to and including line 22; and I ask the gentleman if he can tell us what is meant there by the increase in aviation officers by 73?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman does not understand that that does not apply to the Signal Corps proper? That is an increase in the aviation section, and the aviation section alone. Now, there is another very peculiar part of it. I understand there has been some critcism directed against the aviation section. How well founded that criticism may be I am not able to state, but there never has been, so far as I can ascertain, any criticism directed against the Signal Corps proper. On the contrary, in report after report made by the highest officers of the Army their services have been commended as efficient and in the highest degree skillful; and what can be more necessary than officers in this department? As I understand, the Senate bill complies with the recommendations which were prepared by the General Staff. It adds some 51 officers altogether. This Signal Corps is detailed all over the country—detailed for service in Alaska, in the cable service; they are detailed not only down on the border, but different parts of the country, in Hawaii and the Philippines, Guam, Porto Rico, and other places, and in Panama there is a special division, and other places that might be mentioned. There are several details in the Philippines; still, for some reason I can not understand, and which has not been explained to the committee, there is no increase in the number of officers. I hope when the Senate bill comes over here and the question of concurring with the Senate bill arises that this House will agree to the Senate provision in this respect.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment for the purpose of obtaining some information. I think it is rather singular that the committee has failed to make any recommendation for an increase in the officers of the Signal Corps. I was expecting some explanation would be made. Only a moment ago a committee amendment was offered by the chairman of the committee increasing the officers in the Medical Department. The Medical Department now has a corps of officers ratioing some five and some tenths to a thousand, and it has been increased to seven. I should think that the committee at least owed some explanation as to why in this instance no increase of officers was provided in the bill. There is an increase of noncommissioned officers. If it has been considered that they now have more officers than needed at present, then well and good; but to increase the noncommissioned men without increasing the officers requires an explanation. What is the purpose of not providing a full corps of officers?

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman wish me to answer?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the committee would be very glad to hear from the gentleman on the subject.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that the Signal Corps proper ought to be increased, but the Signal Corps at present is under a cloud, and the committee in considering that proposition thought that they would wait until they got through with this investigation before they would make any recommendation about the increase of that corps. I will state to the gentleman that the Senate has passed a concurrent resolution providing for an investigation of this corps, and the Committee on Military Affairs of the House has reported it to the House, and as soon as this bill passes we hope that the Speaker will recognize us to pass that resolution.

I do not know whether the gentleman is acquainted or not with the circumstances surrounding the Signal Corps and the aviation part of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no knowledge whatever of the subject referred to; only in reading the bill I notice the committee has reported increases in officers in all other branches, but has failed to make any increase here. I understand from the statement of the gentleman that it is purposed before this bill becomes a law to increase the permanent force of the officers of the Signal Corps?

Mr. HAY. Yes. And we have increased the enlisted men by 1,476.

Mr. STAFFORD. And naturally it would require an additional officer force to meet that increase?

Mr. HAY. Yes. And we propose to do that.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of saying that the figures I gave this morning as to the peace strength of the Swiss Army and the Turkish Army were taken from the report of the Secretary of War November 15, 1914. I noticed he used the words "peace strength," when I used the words "standing army." He says that the peace strength of the Turkish Army is 420,000 and the war strength 1,200,000, and the peace strength of the Swiss Army is 140,000, and the total trained war strength is 275,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all satisfied with the explanation which has been given by the chairman of the committee, which really, it seems to me, does not amount to any explanation whatever as to why these officers are not increased. Therefore I offer the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk, which would be in accordance with the recommendations of the General Staff.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, lines 14 and 15, strike out the words "the commissioned officers now allowed by law, and insert in lieu thereof the words:
"One chief signal officer with the rank of brigadier general, 4 colonels, 6 lieutenant colonels, 13 majors, 26 captains, 47 lieutenants."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee has stated that the reason these officers are not increased is that the aviation service is under a cloud. I deny that the Signal Corps proper is under a cloud. It is not under a cloud and has not been under one. There never have been any charges made or any complaints made of any kind whatever of the services rendered by the Signal Corps. On the contrary, as I stated before, their services have been recommended by officer after officer of the highest rank, and an examination of the report with reference to it will show that this has been done.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With pleasure.

Mr. TOWNER. As I understand it, there have been practically 1,000 aviators added by this bill to the Signal Corps?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There has been an addition of something like 1,400 enlisted men and a certain number of noncommissioned officers.

Mr. HAY. Fourteen hundred and seventy-six enlisted men added to the Signal Corps proper; 710 enlisted men added to the aviation section.

Mr. TOWNER. But no provision for any additional officers in the Signal Corps?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. To the Signal Corps proper—none whatever.

Mr. TOWNER. But only to the aviation branch?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a call every day upon the Signal Corps proper for officers. They are wanted in Mexico; they are wanted in various parts of the country for use in these instruction schools. They are needed to actually meet a very important work, and they are simply compelled to refuse these demands that are made upon them, and we have to get along as best we can.

Mr. POWERS. If there are no charges against the Signal Corps, why is it that there was a resolution introduced in the Senate to investigate the Signal Corps?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is not to be made of the Signal Corps, but only a branch of the service. There never has been any complaint, I am sure, of the Signal Corps proper.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. He proposes to increase the Signal Corps by 60 officers. There are 46 now, and he asks for 106. That is an increase of 60. As I said a minute ago, the committee has had this matter under advisement, and, while the gentleman says that the Signal Corps is not under a cloud, the aviation service of the Army is under the Signal Corps, and the aviation service has been attacked in the newspapers, and statements have been circulated to such an extent that it is absolutely necessary that that corps should be investigated. Now, until that is done I do not believe we ought to increase this corps to any appreciable extent. I think when this bill gets to conference we will increase the Signal Corps proper, but I do not think we can do it on the floor of the House without any knowledge on the part of the committee as to the extent it ought to be increased. I therefore hope that the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman will not say, I think, that the proportion which I have given in this amendment and the number of officers which I have stated in this amendment are not in proportion to the additions that have been made in the enlisted men and in the noncommissioned officers?

Mr. HAY. Unquestionably so.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That it is?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman will not say, either, that it is not in the proportion that would be given in the systems asked for by the War Department?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman misunderstood me. I say that the gentleman's figures are out of proportion to what we ought to have.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon; but I will say that I got my figures from an officer, a member of the war staff.

Mr. HAY. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was giving the figures as originally presented by the War Department.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman had my experience, he would know that he can always get from some officer or some member of the General Staff figures to increase the number of officers in the Army.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I got the correct proportionate figures. Now, one question further: If the reason for not increasing the officers was because the Aviation Section was under a cloud, why increase the officers in the Aviation Section?

Mr. HAY. Because they are detailed from the line. They do not come from the Signal Corps at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Therefore the Signal Corps is not responsible for it.

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes; a member of the Signal Corps proper is at the head of the Aviation Section.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But he has officers detailed from some other corps.

Mr. HAY. It is not the officers of the line that are affected by this unfortunate situation. It is the Signal Corps itself, which has charge of aviation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman what was the strength of the Signal Corps before this increase was made?

Mr. HAY. It was 1,212 enlisted men.

Mr. SLAYDEN. To what do you propose to increase it?

Mr. HAY. We propose to increase it to 2,538 enlisted men.

Mr. SLAYDEN. You propose to increase it about 40 per cent, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] proposes to increase it about 160 per cent; is that it?

Mr. HAY. Yes; that is about it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is out of proportion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the Ordnance Department shall, in addition to the commissioned officers and the enlisted men now allowed by law, consist of 2 colonels, 3 lieutenant colonels, 6 majors, 15 captains, and 15 first lieutenants: Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized to detail not to exceed 30 lieutenants from the Army at large for duty as student officers in the establishments of the Ordnance Department for a period of two years; and the completion of the prescribed course of instruction shall constitute the examination for detail in the Ordnance Department.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HULL of Iowa: Page 20, line 16, after the word "of," strike out the word "two" and insert the word "four," and after the word "colonels" strike out the word "three" and insert the word "six"; also in line 17, after the word "colonels," strike out the word "six" and insert the word "thirteen"; after the word "majors" strike out the word "fifteen" and insert the word "seventeen"; after the word "and" strike out the word "fifteen" and insert the word "seventeen."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do hope that the committee will pass this amendment. It is a moderate increase in the Ordnance Department. They ask for 87, and under this amendment we give them 57. In the bill we are only giving them 41, which is not enough.

We are all finding fault to some extent with our arsenals for not supplying the Army with the things to make war with. We should not find fault with them if we do not give them the men to do the work with. These ordnance officers, as you must understand, are simply the superintendents on which the Chief of Ordnance must depend for his work.

There are a great number of things that our arsenals might be furnishing us with for a great deal less than they cost us now if we would only give them the officers they ask for. We might be furnishing aeroplanes; and we are short to-day of machine guns, and we are short of rifles.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman mean to inform the committee that the reason why we are not making machine guns is that we have not got enough officers?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I say if you are going to make machine guns in the future you must furnish the officers that the ordnance officers ask for. I do admit that they say that there is some other reason; but I say that the Chief of Ordnance says that every arsenal is undermanned to-day in its officers.

Now, my friends, I hope that this little increase, which, to my notion, is a very big improvement, will be passed without any question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to support the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

We are proposing to very greatly increase the supply of reserve ammunition and of field guns and of all other war matériel. It is also contemplated to have a great deal of it manufactured in Government arsenals. But whether manufactured in Government arsenals or bought from private manufacturers, it requires considerably more work on the part of ordnance officers in designing and preparing plans for this matériel, and for the inspection of it during the various processes of the work.

Now, I have had perhaps more direct contact with the Ordnance Department in connection with the fortification bill than any other man in the House. I know that there is no corps that is more in demand, considering the work that is now at hand to be done, and I know that much of the criticism that has been aimed at that corps has not been warranted, because of the fact that it was not sufficiently manned.

A statement was made on Saturday, and while I am on my feet it may be well to refer to it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asked a question of the chairman of the committee touching the Lewis gun, and the chairman, in a hurried reply, made the statement that it had been rejected by the Ordnance Department, and that we were in a measure without machine guns, because they had not seen fit to adopt a gun that had subsequently been taken up abroad.

The facts in connection with the Lewis gun are these: That Mr. Lewis, a retired Army officer, submitted a gun to the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications for test; the gun was manufactured out of faulty material, and during the test a part of it broke, and Mr. Lewis's agents suggested that the gun be withdrawn in order that they might supply a gun better manufactured, in order that the test might be an adequate one. Tests were arranged for and the gun was being built in England, but about the time they were to deliver the second gun for test the war broke out abroad, and that gun, as well as all other guns that the English could get hold of, was taken possession of, and the representatives of the Lewis gun have not yet been able to present to the Ordnance Department for test any gun, although efforts are being made and have been made to get such a gun for proper test.

The reports that we get from abroad touching that gun are both favorable and unfavorable, and only a test can show whether it is the most desirable type. At present the Ordnance Department have in a measure indorsed the Vickers machine gun, and are preparing to supply the service with some of these guns.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman is speaking of what is known as the Lewis gun?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What was the type of gun furnished to the troops at Columbus on the Mexican line?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not certain, but I know that it was one of the older type of machine gun. I am also advised, but informally, that the trouble was not at all with the gun. I presume that the question the gentleman was going to ask was why it was that that gun apparently was useless when the emergency arose. I have made inquiry as to that, and the matter is being fully investigated. From what I can hear, there was no fault in the gun itself. The trouble probably came through the jamming of a cartridge in the haste of loading, which is liable to happen with almost any gun, but more liable to happen with guns of the earlier types. One of the things that they try to arrive at in getting the very best model is to prevent the possibility of just such things as that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman from Kentucky will be granted.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want, however, to conclude by again calling attention to the merit of this amendment. There is going to be brought in a fortifications bill that will provide for the accumulation of very much more matériel for the Army than has been provided for by any previous bill or several previous bills. You are going to have, and properly, a constantly increasing demand upon this corps. It is not fair to expect them to do this very greatly enlarged work unless you supply the men and the facilities.

Another thing: When the supreme test comes for which all of this preparation is made—the test of actual war—you can not then go out and get ordnance officers for love or money. They can not be made overnight. When the European war broke out there was hardly an ordnance officer who could not name his own price to private manufacturers in America, in order to carry to such manufacturers the skill that only the ordnance men possess touching the manufacture of munitions of war; and the corps lost some of its very best men, because of salaries that were offered them, that were not only double, but 10 and 20 times what they were receiving from the Government of the United States. Now, if you are going to have an efficient ordnance department, you have got to prepare for it in advance. These men can not be qualified by a month or six weeks or a year of work. It takes several years of work to transform an ordinary army officer into a proper ordnance officer; and I hope the committee will see the wisdom of agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL]. My reason for doing so is that, in addition to the reasons indicated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], there is another great work that ought to be done, and it ought to be done now. We ought to have to-day a dozen ordnance officers, if possible, in Europe studying the designs of guns, caissons, carriages, and other things of this character, where they are being actually used, in order to bring back their knowledge to this country for our own use. We ought to have a dozen additional ordnance officers in the Ordnance Department right here in Washington working out designs for such guns as we need for our coast protection—what I the other day called a semimobile artillery.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET. Would any of the contending armies in Europe permit our observers to be with their armies, to study their ordnance, at present?

Mr. TILSON. They might not get very close to the front, but they could get close enough to gather some very valuable information which we ought to have; and certainly we ought to have ordnance officers here working on these things. Instead of using high-class skilled experts practically as clerks in conducting the Ordnance Department here in Washington we ought to have more of them doing real scientific work, more technical work along the lines for which they have received a highly technical and scientific education. The Ordnance Department itself is eager to do more of this kind of work, but is handicapped by lack of officers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand we have been appropriating from $9,000,000 to $12,000,000 annually heretofore for ammunition, and that last year the appropriation ran up to $19,000,000, and that in the forthcoming year we will probably appropriate $35,000,000, which would be three times as much as formerly. The proposition in the Hay bill is to increase the number of ordnance officers about 50 per cent. Does not the gentleman think we ought to increase the number of officers in proportion as we increase the ammunition supply?

Mr. TILSON. I do; and there is going to be more work, if an amendment which I shall offer to this bill when we reach section 21 is adopted, providing for special appliances in the way of gauges, jigs, and so forth, that are absolutely necessary in the production of arms and ammunition by the repetitive process. If that amendment is adopted it will require the attention of a number of ordnance officers in the proper preparation of these necessary appliances that we must have if we intend to produce arms and ammunition in quantities sufficient for war purposes. In my judgment, we shall not make a mistake in giving the full number of officers asked for by the Ordnance Department, and I believe that is just what the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa covers.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support this amendment, and I believe in improving our Ordnance Department. I can not, however, entirely agree with those who attempt to excuse the condition of our Army as to machine guns. I wish to read from the testimony of Gen. Crozier, Chief of the Ordnance Department, upon the machine-gun question.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], who introduced this amendment, referring to the fact that Europe was buying our output of guns, asked him if in case war should come to us at the close of the European war we would not be without machine guns, and they would have them all; that is, if we depended upon our private manufacturers.

Gen. Crozier replied:

If we should let the present course go on until the close of the war, we would only have a thousand in the event war broke out.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. You are not manufacturing at all now?

Gen. CROZIER. Not manufacturing at all now, because we have recently adopted a new model which we are not equipped to make. We had intended to manufacture them in small quantities. We were manufacturing them.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. How long since you abandoned manufacturing them?

Gen. CROZIER. Something over a year ago.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The European war has been going on for 16 months?

Gen. CROZIER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Don't you think that we should be making them?

Gen. CROZIER. I think we ought to be. There is a reason, however, why we are not now making even the small number we could make in our own factory.

Now, we have heard much discussion upon the question of the efficiency of the Army and about adding a few thousand men to the Regular Establishment. My idea is that the first thing needed to promote its efficiency is to see that it is equipped with those things which the European war has shown are essential to make an army effective, and the machine gun is one of those essentials. In referring to the surprises of the war in Europe Gen. Crozier said:

Another point is the use of the machine gun, in regard to which we have some startling statements. The minister of munitions of the British Government, in making a speech on the subject of supplies the other day, and alluding to the question of machine guns, stated that for weeks a portion of the German front in western Europe was held by 45 machine guns manned by 90 men, against a whole French Army, which had been repulsed in repeated assaults.

In other words, 90 men armed with 45 machine guns have stood off an army. If we really mean to make our Army efficient, we have here testimony from a high authority that a hundred thousand men equipped with plenty of effective machine guns can defy an army of a million men without them.

The machine guns at Columbus did not work, and we have just listened to an explanation of the disaster. I saw in the public press the other day where men high in authority in the Government said that no complaint had been made before as to the reliability of these guns or their efficiency in battle. Here is what Gen. Crozier stated to the committee upon that matter in response to a question from Mr. KAHN:

> Now, as I stated yesterday, there has been a good deal of complaint about the operation of the machine guns. Of course, like every other machine, the machine gun has troubles of its own, and I dare say that some of the complaints which have been made are justified. But under the circumstances of detail, as I have mentioned, it is very difficult to give competent instruction to these extra statutory organizations, and it is very difficult to retain instructed men and officers in such organizations.

Now, somewhere down there in Mexico are 5,000 American boys with their lives depending upon the efficiency of the arms that the Government furnishes them. I, for one, want to see this corps enlarged so that we may have no apologies to make in the future as to the arms that we furnish to these men who fight the battles of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from Virginia say that the committee will accept the amendment?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then there is no use of discussing it further. I intended to advocate it, but that settles it.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I arose to ask a question of the gentleman from Nebraska and he yielded to me, but I think the Chair did not hear him. I would like to have him answer the question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will answer the gentleman if I can.

Mr. HULBERT. What I would like to ask is as to the length of time necessary to educate an officer for the Ordnance Department?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not know that I am informed, but I am told that it requires a long period and requires great technical skill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are a number of officers now acting in the arsenals in this country who have been in service only six months. That service is regarded as inefficient to equip a man for the work he has to do. For instance, the inspection of technical work, going into a private factory to inspect work made under contract, and so forth. It is believed that they ought to have two or three years' experience.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I think that the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. HULBERT. I am not quite through. Can the gentleman tell me the cost to the Government of the education of one of these officers in order that they may serve in the Ordnance Department?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The graduates of West Point cost something like $12,000 to the Government, and these men are supposed to be fitted for ordnance work.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, the gentleman from Nebraska is mistaken in that. The man who graduates from West Point is not in a position to take up ordnance work.

Mr. HAY. Well, it does not cost the Government anything more.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand that, but the gentleman from Nebraska was giving the impression that the course at West Point was sufficient to educate a man in the Ordnance Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that the time of the gentleman from Nebraska be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to ask, after the cadet graduates from West Point, how long it is necessary for him to serve in the Ordnance Department before he is qualified?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. About three years, I think.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose you put a man with a West Point education in the optical department of an arsenal, does not the gentleman think he must have some experience before he can be put into a technical business—for instance, we are making submarines, and they were not known when Annapolis was created.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to ask how long it is necessary that a man shall serve in the Ordnance Department before he shall be permitted to resign from the service?

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. HULBERT. Yes; I will permit a question from anybody who can give any information.

Mr. HILL. A West Point graduate is not like a machine, and as to how long it will take him to get a certain education depends on the man after he graduates.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired and all time has expired.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time be extended five minutes in order to enlighten us on this question of how long a man has to serve before he can relinquish his services to the Government and go out to a private employer.

The CHAIRMAN. For whom does the gentleman ask an extension of time?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Any member of the committee.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that the chairman of the committee be given five minutes to answer this supplemental question propounded by the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. HAY. All I can say is that under the law when a man goes to West Point he binds himself to remain in the Army for eight years, I believe, after graduation. It does not make any difference whether he goes into the Ordnance Department or the Cavalry. If the President would accept his resignation, he could resign at any time thereafter.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Evidently the gentleman from New York is somewhat concerned in the statement that I made about these men resigning out of the Ordnance Corps.

Mr. HULBERT. That is the point.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not now clear whether an officer could or could not resign, but no one has ever insisted that you could compel him after his contract period entered into when admitted to West Point to stay in the service. Certainly you would not want him in there if you had to keep him in, and in each instance of these ordnance officers who have resigned the officer has requested permission to resign and that permission has been given. One of the reasons why it was given is because it is believed it would be very greatly to the interest of the people of America that private plants should be enabled to engage in the kind of work that they would need to do for us in case of war, and that these men are the only men possessed of the technical knowledge to enable these plants to engage in such work. In each instance the request to be relieved was put up to the Secretary of War and I think to the President, and permission granted before the officer left the service. In some instances the request was not granted until a time that would be convenient to the Ordnance Department. I think there is now an application pending to permit an officer to resign which has not yet been acted upon.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for half a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my questioning was merely to bring out and to illustrate the expense to which the Federal Government is put in order to educate men at West Point that they may enter into the service of private industries for the purpose of carrying out the work of munition plants and to emphasize that some adequate provision to recompense the Government be considered and adopted.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] says that no more machine guns are being constructed?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. By the Army.

Mr. GARDNER. I do not understand that to be the fact. The 1,077 machine guns which we are supposed to have, as a matter of fact have not all been constructed. I think it is correct to say that no new machine guns have been begun in the last year or two, but I think there are still about 125 of those 1,077 machine guns which have not been completed. I just wish to remove the misapprehension in this House that we have 1,077 machine guns in the Army, because I am sure we have not.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They are not all of the same type.

Mr. HAY. There have been no machine guns manufactured by the War Department for the last three years, and the Chief of Ordnance, Gen. Crozier, stated in the hearings that we had on hand 1,077 machine guns.

Mr. GARDNER. I know what he stated, and I wrote to the War Department, and I will publish the answer to-morrow morning, because I have it at home. I may be mistaken, but to the best of my knowledge and belief the gentleman from Virginia is incorrect.

Mr. HAY. I can only say that I wish the War Department or its officers when they go before a committee would tell the same story before the committee that they tell afterwards, because otherwise it creates confusion.

Mr. GARDNER. There are several occasions on which I think that the chairman and the Chief of Ordnance may have misunderstood each other in the hearings. There are a number of matters upon which I have a somewhat different report from the department.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] a question. Did I understand him to say awhile ago that it took about $2,000 or $12,000 to educate one of these ordnance men?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. My reply was that the cost of a cadet four years at West Point was about $12,000.

Mr. POWERS. Is not the gentleman mistaken in that? Is it not just a little over $2,000?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am sure it is as much as $12,000 for the four years.

Mr. POWERS. They pay them only $45 a month, and that is $540 a year, and for four years the amount would be a little over $2,000.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. But I meant to include the entire cost of maintenance of the school, and the chairman of the committee informs me that it is more than I have stated; that the War Department has reported something like $18,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, on page 486 of volume 1 of the hearings there is a statement as to how many machine guns we have. The chairman of the committee was questioning Gen. Crozier, and the following occurred:

The CHAIRMAN. How many machine guns have you? My recollection is that the number is something like 1,200?

Gen. CROZIER. We have built and under construction, Mr. Chairman, 1,077.

The CHAIRMAN. How many of those are in reserve and how many are in the hands of the troops? In other words, how many machine guns are in the hands of the troops?

Gen CROZIER. We have with the troops about five per regiment. The regularly authorized number is four per regiment, but we supply them with one spare gun.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendments are withdrawn and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That a list of not to exceed 986 officers of the Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, and Infantry arms of the service, of grades from first lieutenant to colonel, inclusive, lawfully detached from their proper commands for duty with the National Guard, or other duty, the usual period of which exceeds one year, said list to include the 200 detached officers provided for by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1911, shall, on and after July 1, 1916, be subject to the provisions of section 27 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, with reference to details to the staff corps. The total number of officers hereby authorized for each grade on said list entire shall be in proportion to the total number of officers of the corresponding grade now authorized by law other than this act for all of the said four arms combined, exclusive of second lieutenants and of the 200 extra officers authorized by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1911, and exclusive also of the additional officers authorized by said act in order to restore lineal rank lost through the system of regimental promotion formerly in force; and the total number of officers hereby authorized for each grade in each of said arms on said list shall be in the proportion borne by the number of officers now authorized by law for such grade and arm to the total number of officers now authorized by law other than this act for the corresponding grade in all of the said four arms combined, exclusive of the extra and additional officers last hereinbefore specified and excluded: Provided, That any vacancy created or caused in any of the said arms of the service by the assignment of an officer of any grade to said list of detached officers shall be filled, subject to such examination as is now or may hereafter be prescribed by law, by the promotion of the senior officer eligible to promotion in the next lower grade in the arm in which such vacancy shall occur: Provided further, That no officer of any of said arms of the service shall be permitted to remain on said list of detached officers for more than 30 days unless he shall have been actually present for duty for at least two years out of the last preceding six years with an organization composed of one or more statutory units, or the equivalent thereof, of the arm to which he shall belong: Provided further, That after the apportionment of officers to said list of detached officers shall have been made as authorized by this act, whenever any vacancy shall have been caused in said list by the separation of an officer of any grade therefrom, such vacancy shall be filled by the detail and assignment to said list of an officer of the corresponding grade in that arm in which there shall be found the officer of the next lower grade who at that time shall be the senior in rank of all the officers of the said lower grade in all of the four arms hereinbefore specified; if two or more officers of different arms shall be found to have equal seniority in rank in said lower grade, the officer having the longest commissioned service shall be regarded as the senior, and, this failing to decide, the question shall be decided by lot: And provided further, That if under the operation of the foregoing provisions of this section the number of officers returned to any particular arm of the service shall at any time exceed the number authorized by law for any grade in such arm, promotion to such grade shall cease until the number of officers therein shall have been reduced below the number authorized by law: Provided further, That retired officers under assignment to active duty who have or shall have, as such officers, been continuously under assignment to such duty for 10 years or more, and who have or shall have rendered exceptionally valuable service during that period, may, in the discretion of the President and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be advanced on the retired list to the grades, not above that of major, that they would have attained in due course of promotion, respectively, if they had remained on the active list; and for the purposes of this proviso any officer retired before the separation of the Field Artillery from the Coast Artillery shall be regarded as having belonged to the Field Artillery: Provided further, That those captains of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry whom the act of Congress approved March 4, 1915, required to be recommissioned as captains of Infantry of the United States Army and to take rank on the lineal list of officers of Infantry immediately after the junior officers of the same grade, whose total commissioned service equals or exceeds theirs, shall be transferred forthwith to the places so prescribed for them on said list, and said captains shall not thereafter be available for duty as captains in the Porto Rico Regiment: Provided further, That not exceeding one commissioned officer, of rank not higher than grade of captain, of each regiment of the National Guard or major portion of a regiment shall be detailed each year for instruction in the various service schools maintained for instruction of officers of the Regular Army, and that while under such instruction shall receive the same pay and allowances of officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 24, after the word "law," insert the words "other than this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Also the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 8, strike out the word "senior" and insert, after the word "officers," in same line, the words "who shall be the senior in rank of those."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Page 23, line 14, strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "eight."

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion? I want to call his attention to a little matter. The last amendment the gentleman submitted, as I heard it, in line 8, page 22, reads, "senior in rank to those"; the word "officer" following in the same line should read "officers."

Mr. HAY. It should be to those officers.

Mr. KAHN. Then the gentleman desires to add the letter "s" to the word "officer"?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "eight" in line 14, committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 23, line 14, by striking out "ten" and inserting "eight."

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be recognized.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I will yield to the gentleman at any time; I merely want to keep the proper order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHIPERFIELD: Page 23, line 12, strike out lines 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and in line 24 the words "Field Artillery," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided further, That retired officers under assignment to active duty who have, or shall have, as such officers, been continuously under assignment to such duty for three years or more, and who have, or shall have, rendered exceptionally valuable service during that period, or during their service on the active list, may, in the discretion of the President and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be advanced on the retired list to the grades, not above major, that they would have attained in due course of promotion, respectively, if they had remained on the active list for a period beyond the date of their retirement equal to the total amount of time during which each of them, at the time of such advancement, had been detailed on active duty since retirement; and for the purposes of this proviso any officer of Artillery retired before the separation of the Field Artillery from the Coast Artillery shall be regarded as having belonged to the Field Artillery."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire recognition on this amendment?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Kansas, if he desires it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire recognition?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; it was for the purpose of offering another amendment to perfect the section, and after that I desire to be recognized if the gentleman from Illinois is agreeable.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I would be very glad to yield to Mr. ANTHONY. I merely wanted to save the order of amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would like to ask the gentleman how much time he expects to occupy?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I should not occupy over five minutes under the rule.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would be very glad for the gentleman to proceed now.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take precedence of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] in any way, for as a member of the committee he is entitled to recognition.

I desire to urge this amendment as appealing to the reason and fairness of this House, and not merely to clamor for its adoption. It seems to me that it commends itself to the judgment of members of this committee, and also to the honorable chairman of this committee.

The object and purpose of the language used in this section of the bill between lines 12 and 24 is evidently for the purpose of obtaining and attracting the service of retired officers for active duty and to enable the Army to bring to its aid the services of these retired officers.

However, it seems to me this bill fails of its purpose to fairly do this for this reason, and I will give a concrete illustration of what I have in mind in a minute. It fails of its purpose because it simply authorizes the appointing power—in this case the President—to take into consideration the services of a retired officer for a period of 10 years—or 8 years if the amendment prevails—that he has performed after his retirement and closes the door to and forbids a consideration of his services, no matter how valuable and distinguished they may have been while he was upon the active list.

Although he may have served the greater part of the time that would be required to be served to enable him to have a promotion and is for some reason retired a brief time before that time arrives, he must be put precisely upon the same terms as the officer who served but a few months actively and then was retired, and who immediately after was detailed to active duty.

Now, let me give a concrete illustration.

We will suppose that Jones and Smith were both commissioned lieutenants of Infantry in July, 1892.

Jones is retired as a second lieutenant in June, 1903, and detailed for active duty in July, 1906. He would be eligible under this bill for appointment as major in 1916 after 1 year's active service and 10 years' duty on the retired list.

Now, let us take the case of Smith who is commissioned at the same time. He is promoted to first lieutenant in 1898, is promoted to captain in 1908, he is retired as captain seven years after, in 1915. He is detailed for active duty in July, 1915, and he would be eligible for appointment as major in 1925.

Now, the situation is this: Jones, after active service of 1 year and 10 years on the retired list, but detailed to active duty, would be eligible for appointment as major, while Smith, after an active service of 23 years, would still require 10 years' active detail on the retired list, or 33 years, as against the 11 years of the other officer.

In other words, the officer with the longer service loses all the benefit of his active service, and when put on the retired list, although detailed to active duty, has no advantage over the other officer with practically no active service.

Now, under the amendment of the bill that has been offered as a substitute, it simply means that each of these men would have a right to have taken into consideration their service, both active and while retired, and it means one would be eligible to appointment as major after 23½ years and the other in 26 years.

The purpose of it is simply this, gentlemen: It equalizes the services of the men and takes into consideration what each has accomplished, and it says that the appointing power may not only consider their term of service and the manner in which it was performed but also the further question of performance of duty while they were retired and on active duty.

Thus the officer who has been retired after long years of service will have the benefit of his active service as well as the benefit of his service while retired.

I do not wish to clamor for this amendment nor weary the House with a lengthy presentation of it, but it simply looks to me to be an act of ordinary justice to the different men, and allows each to stand upon his merits as to active service and honorable service while upon the retired list.

I sincerely hope the chairman of this committee and the committee itself will see that the proposed substitute is a fair measure, because it does injustice to no man and it does equal justice to all.

It does not put the man who has had that long service and who was not so fortunate as to be so speedily detailed to active duty upon the same plane as the officer with the much shorter service, and it does equal fairness to all.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois ought not to be adopted, because it would create an invidious distinction between the officers on the retired list. This provision is intended to take care of certain officers on the retired list who have rendered distinguished service. Now, if you are going back and take the services of some man on the retired list rendered when he was on the active list and add that to this, you are not doing what the provision of the bill proposes to do, and that is to give an inducement to men on the retired list to postpone active duty. Therefore I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the distinguished gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Perhaps you will observe by the terms of the amendment that it only applies to those officers who have also rendered distinguished and exceptional services while they were on the active list of the Army, and it gives them the benefit of that service.

The amendment also allows consideration for their services as officers on the retired list, or, in other words, when they are detailed to active duty.

Mr. HAY. I realize what the gentleman says, but, as I say, you are giving to the men on the retired list who have had distinguished service on the active list a benefit which you do not give other men on the retired list. Now, the purpose of this amendment is to induce men on the retired list——

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I quite agree with your statement.

Mr. HAY. And also cutting down the time to three years.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Let me ask your opinion of this, if you will yield just a moment further, and then I will not press for further answer.

Suppose an officer has served in the Army until he would almost be entitled to his appointment, say, as a major, and for some reason for which he is not responsible, he is retired; and suppose another officer was commissioned second lieutenant and retired a year after; now, then, when those officers are detailed to active duty it requires precisely the same time for both to be eligible to the appointment of a grade not higher than major, does it not?

Mr. HAY. No; the man who was put on the retired list as second lieutenant never could reach the rank of major.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Let us say that he has been appointed to the place where he could have the benefit of the promotion.

Mr. HAY. He could not. When a man goes on the retired list he can not be promoted.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Except after he has been, under the provisions of your bill, detailed to active duty for a period of 10 years, then he is eligible—or eight years, with your amendment.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Now, then, you do away with and forget absolutely, so far as promotion is concerned, the long years of honorable service of the first officer, and you put the man with no considerable service precisely upon the same basis as he.

Mr. HAY. Oh, no; we do not do that at all. We do not give him any promotion until he has rendered the service.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Until he has rendered 10 years. But in one case when he is detailed for active duty he may have many years of service, and in the other case but one year, and they have the same promotion. It seems to me manifestly unfair.

Mr. HAY. In any event, under this provision he can not be promoted beyond the rank of major.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. The evil I want to have corrected by this amendment is this: An officer may have had a total service of only one or two years actively, and then retired, and another officer may have a service of 10 or 15 years actively, with distinguished and honorable service, and is then retired, and they stand precisely upon the same basis as far as their eligibility to this appointment is concerned.

Mr. HAY. I would call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that only a man who is a captain on the retired list can get the benefit of this provision. Now, the second lieutenant or first lieutenant can not. Only a captain can get the benefit of the provision in the bill.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I take sharp issue with the gentleman there, as I construe this bill. Any commissioned officer on the retired list is eligible to promotion under its terms. Now, if I am in error, I certainly will thank the gentleman to correct me.

Mr. CRAGO. I can give the gentleman a little explanation of it if he desires it. I want to ask one question: Do you understand the men we are seeking to provide for in this amendment are doing active duty now?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. It would not have to be necessary.

Mr. CRAGO. That is the whole purpose of this, I will say to the gentleman, namely, to take care of the men on the retired list by reason of some disability over which they have no control, and who are rendering exceptional service to the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. I ask that the gentlemen have more time if they desire it.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I just want to have the point settled. Would not this bill apply in the future just the same as it does to officers now on the active list and who may be subsequently retired?

Mr. CRAGO. It would.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. But somewhere now——

Mr. CRAGO. Any officer who has been retired and who has done eight years' continuous active service for his country under that retired rank can take advantage of this in the future.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Tell me, if you will be kind enough, why should an officer with many years of good service to his credit lose the benefit of those years of service and be put on the same plane as an officer of only a few years' service?

Mr. CRAGO. He is not understood to be. He will get just what he is entitled to. We are adding to the men on the retired list, who have been on active duty for eight years on the retired list, and who have been rendering such valuable service that they have been particularly mentioned on account of that service.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Let us not consider the question of eligibility with reference to the grade, but suppose a captain was serving, for purposes of illustration, for eight years of the time that would eventually have entitled him to a majority; and suppose another captain had served only a few days and each was retired. Should not the time that the first officer had rendered faithful and distinguished service, added to the active service, while on the retired list make for his promotion after he has been restored to active duty?

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman that this provision applies only to men who are on the retired list and who to-day are doing active service.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. To be sure; but I am referring to all the cases that the bill will affect, just as in the case that the gentleman cites.

Mr CRAGO. In this bill the application is made to the man who is now serving on active duty for the country.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I do not catch the point which the gentleman is making. Take, in one instance, a man who has not quite served the time that will entitle him to promotion, although he had served nearly the entire period that would entitle him to promotion, but if he were retired at the time when he was almost entitled to his promotion, he would have to serve 10 years more as a retired officer before he could be appointed and confirmed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and manifestly it is unfair, and it is these injustices that are bringing promotions in the Army into discredit. The officer ought to have the benefit of all the duty both on the active and the retired lists he has performed.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course you do not measure the value of the service rendered by an officer on the active list by the time he serves?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. So that a man who had been in active service only a year, and in that year he might have made some great sacrifice that would necessitate his being put on the retired list, and which would be equivalent to many years of active duty, and——

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Why do you deny the possibility of great sacrifice to the man with the long service and only give it to the man with the short service? You say the officer with the much longer service must serve 10 years while on the retired list before receiving the benefit of this act.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. They both begin on even conditions.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Do you think that is right? Most certainly, I do not.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do, under the circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order, unless somebody wants to continue the discussion further.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. One moment. Does the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] go to the section that is proposed to be stricken out?

Mr. ANTHONY. It goes to the entire section.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas to let me perfect the amendment by offering an amendment, and then I will yield to him. The question now is, as I understand, Mr. Chairman, on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. It is this way: The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois proposes to strike out the entire paragraph here. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, perfecting that paragraph, should be voted on first, and then the Chair will put the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] desire time?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes, Mr. Chairman. It is so long a time since I was retired from service on this honorable Committee on Military Affairs that I am very slow in catching on, but a number of remarks were uttered here this afternoon which indicate to me that behind this phrasing there is an intent to pass personal legislation. I do not believe in it. I believe that when we provide laws for retirement and laws for promotion and laws for recognition of distinguished service they ought to be general in their application.

I would like to ask some of the gentlemen interested in this particular matter how many men there are that they are now seeking to provide for? I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] who it is that he is seeking to protect or advance in this legislation?

Mr. CRAGO. I am very glad that the gentleman asked that question, and if I have time I am perfectly willing to make this short statement. It was a matter that was brought to the attention of the committee in this way: We had a young man in the Tenth Pennsylvania who served as an enlisted man. He was a newspaper reporter. He served in the Philippines and came back with the regiment and took an examination for promotion as second lieutenant in the Regular Army. When he was advanced to first lieutenant he had attracted the attention of the Army by his work in the department, but, unfortunately, in the course of a maneuver he was thrown from his horse and the drum of his ear was injured. He was retired as a first lieutenant. He was immediately detailed to the recruiting service, and for two full terms of recruiting duty he has served in the city of Chicago and has received special mention from the War Department by reason of his efficiency in that service.

Mr. SLAYDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question in my time? [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; surely.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is he not drawing full pay, as though he were on the active list?

Mr. CRAGO. I presume he is drawing the pay of first lieutenant.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He is drawing the pay of the rank that he has. That is the law, is it not?

Mr. CRAGO. He has furnished, according to the statistics of the War Department, a sixth of all the recruits of the Army in the last few years. He has furnished the largest per cent of the men authorized the other day, and I noticed an editorial in one of the papers commending him. He is doing the duty ordinarily performed by a captain or a major.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman's statement is absolutely illuminating, but a trifle too long, because I have only 5 minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAGO. I will ask for time in my own right a little later.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is precisely as I thought. It is legislation for one man.

Mr. CRAGO. Not necessarily.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, yes. It is made to appear general in terms, to make it more seductive; but in fact it is for one man only. Now, that young man is drawing pretty good pay—three-fourths pay of a first lieutenant on the retired list, and when doing active service the full, or active, pay of his rank.

Mr. CRAGO. And he has performed the duties of a captain or major at full pay.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then he is drawing full pay. While he is detailed to an active officer's duty he is drawing the full pay.

Mr. CRAGO. Of a first lieutenant.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Of the rank that he held, of course—not the rank of a major general or the rank of a sergeant, but the rank that he held.

Mr. CRAGO. And he is performing the duty of a captain or a major.

Mr. SLAYDEN. My impression is that not only should the amendment be rejected, but that the whole paragraph should be knocked out.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] says he has just retired from this committee. I can remember when he served on the committee with me, and I can remember when he favored just such a proposition as this. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. I apologize, if I did.

Mr. HAY. I do not think there is anything wrong about taking care of a man who deserves it, and I think this is a deserving case. I want to say in explanation that I was wrong and the gentleman from Illinois was right when he stated that the officers on the retired list provided for in this section could be promoted from second lieutenant up to captain or major.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] to strike out the lines indicated and insert the language contained in his substitute.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 23, line 16, after the word "period," insert the following: "shall have such period counted in computing their length of service."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 24, line 11, strike out the word "grade" and insert the word "that."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 24, line 16, after the word "receive," insert the following: "out of any National Guard funds available for the purpose."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to come in at the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 11 insert:

"Provided, That the President may, after ascertaining that they are qualified and fitted for service, both as to age and military fitness, recommission officers who have heretofore held a commission in the Regular Army."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Virginia what is the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman that this amendment was drawn for two reasons. One is to have men who have resigned from the Army restored, if the President sees fit to do it, after requiring that they take the proper examination to show their fitness. The other reason is to relieve this House of constant applications for the restoration to the Army of officers who have resigned.

Mr. STAFFORD. In listening to the reading of the amendment I noticed the word "age," and the query arose in my mind whether it would permit the restoration to the service for detail to colleges and the National Guard of those who had retired by reason of age.

Mr. HAY. We have now in the law a provision which permits men who have been retired for disability, upon their own application, to be examined again and restored to the Army if they stand the proper examination and if they are not too old.

Mr. STAFFORD. But this amendment will not cover those who retire on account of age and who still wish to perform duty by assignment to the National Guard or to military schools.

Mr. HAY. Those who retire for age are not generally detailed for such service. They are 64 years of age when they are retired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman does not propose to provide for retired officers of that character performing the work of instruction to the National Guard and in military schools by detailing officers who have been retired on account of age?

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should not officers retired for age be permitted to do this work of instruction at colleges and military schools?

Mr. HAY. They do it now, some few of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Officers who have been retired on account of age?

Mr. HAY. Some, but very few, because when a man retires on account of age he has reached the age of 64.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman that I know of one or two officers retired for age who are serving in colleges.

Mr. HAY. Yes; but this amendment is applicable to young officers who have resigned for the purpose of going into business, but who in time of emergency or in time of war might want to come back or who may want to come back at any time.

Mr. STAFFORD. This will also cover those men who have been connected with the Ordnance Department who have resigned because of the allurements offered by private establishments.

Mr. HAY. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. SLEMP. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. SLEMP. What rank will such an officer take when he comes back?

Mr. HAY. The rank he held when he went out.

Mr. SLEMP. Would or would he not be entitled to the promotion that he would have received if he had remained in the service?

Mr. HAY. I do not think so. I do not think a man who goes out of the service and stays out for seven or eight years ought to come back and take the rank which he might have attained if he had remained in the service.

Mr. SLEMP. Would this amendment involve that sort of promotion?

Mr. HAY. It does not involve it. It leaves that in the discretion of the President.

Mr. KAHN. As I understand it, the purpose of the amendment is to provide by law for the readmission to the Army of officers who have gone out for some reason or other. At the present time the Committee on Military Affairs has before it a large number of private bills, for this individual and that individual, and if this amendment is adopted it will not be necessary hereafter to introduce special bills for any individual. He can go to the War Department and get his rights.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we have a great many private bills at different times, as suggested by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], for the restoration of officers to the Army where they have resigned or gone on the retired list, or something else has happened. I think it is quite wise, where we are making considerable increase in the officers of the Army, and where we may need the services of anyone who is perfectly competent and has had training, to authorize the President to reinstate these men upon their own application. I am not quite sure of the effect of the amendment, however, and I do not suppose the gentleman from Virginia is.

Mr. HAY. The amendment was drawn and handed to me by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] on the floor.

Mr. MANN. It is one of those things that I think we are all fairly well in accord upon—the general purpose to be accomplished. I am not quite sure what the effect will be as to the age limit at which men may be restored.

Mr. HAY. I think it ought to be safeguarded.

Mr. MANN. I am not sure but that it is safeguarded so far now that no one can get in. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes in explanation of it, because it is an important part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that the amendment be first reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments by Mr. ANTHONY:

Page 21, line 15, strike out "all of the said four arms combined" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the whole Army."

Page 21, on line 21, to include line 2, page 22:

Strike out the words "and the total number of officers hereby authorized for each grade in each of said arms on said list shall be in the proportion borne by the number of officers now authorized by law for such grade and arm to the total number of officers now authorized by law other than this act for the corresponding grade in all of the said arms combined, exclusive of the extra and additional officers hereinbefore specified and excluded."

Page 22, line 16, to page 23, line 5:

Strike out entire proviso beginning "That after the apportionment," to include "decided by lot," and insert in lieu thereof: "Every detail to fill any original or subsequent vacancy in the list of detached officers shall be made in such manner as shall tend most effectively to equalize promotion in the Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, and Infantry, except that when a particular detached service can be performed by an officer of only one of the four arms above specified, the detail shall be made from that particular arm, but in such manner and from such grade as shall least tend to defeat the intent of this proviso, which is to utilize the detached-officers list as a means of equalizing promotion in the four arms above specified in so far as this may be done without prejudice to military efficiency: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be so construed as to reduce any officer below the grade he now occupies or to change the relative position of any officer on the lineal list of his own arm or to transfer any officer from his own arm to another arm of the service or to separate any officer from the military service."

On page 23, line 5, after the word "further," strike out all up to line 12 and insert: "That if under the operation of the foregoing provisions of this section the number of officers in any grade of any arm of the service shall at any time exceed the number authorized by law for such grade in such arm, promotion to such grade in such arm shall close until the number of officers therein shall have been reduced below the number authorized by law."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, and the gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for not exceeding 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, this section of the bill is one that provides for nine hundred and some odd additional officers who shall be detached from the four branches of the service for the purpose of providing a sufficient number of officers to train the increased National Guard we are creating by this bill and to furnish officers for instruction in the various institutions of learning which have military organizations.

Now, it is proposed that we shall make use of these 900 extra officers when they are detached for the purpose of remedying an evil which exists in the Army to-day in reference to the inequalities of promotion in past years, and inequalities of promotion which will be further accentuated if the provisions of the present bill are enacted into law.

When the matter came before the committee nearly every Member admitted that the language it was necessary to use to frame an amendment which would provide a fair equalization was so technical that none of us thoroughly understood it. It was decided to pass the matter up until it came before the House. In the meantime the War Department has been working on some fair solution of the problem of helping equalize by means of this provision and the Secretary of War on Saturday sent to the Military Committee the substance of the amendment which I have offered and which has been read from the desk and which will go far toward remedying the inequalities which I have spoken of.

Now, this chart is not an infernal machine, although it looks like one. I am going to use it to try and illustrate in a simple manner just where the inequalities exist it is proposed to remedy.

This represents the proposed detached list of officers, such as we are going to create, and I am going to explain to you how the War Department desires to use it. The evils that we want to try and remove are due to the fact that in the four branches of the service at present inequalities of promotion exist, as shown by these tacks in the diagram. For instance, yellow represents Cavalry, the blue Infantry, the light red the Field Artillery, and the dark red the Coast Artillery.

These varying ratios illustrate, for instance, the condition existing in the Cavalry arm of the service, where the officers above captain, major, lieutenant colonel, and colonel, taking it over a series of years, say back 25 years, due entirely to inequalities of legislation, not the fault of the officers themselves, that the Cavalry arm, which is now in such demand on the Mexican border, are 6 years or more behind in promotion as compared with the officers of the Coast Artillery which have had exactly the same length of service. It means that cadets graduated from the Military Academy 25 years ago went into the Army with the same education, the same ability, and that these men, who happened to get into the Cavalry, are 6 years behind the cadets of the same class who went into the Coast Artillery. Some of the Cavalry officers are still majors, while their brother cadets who went into the Coast Artillery are now lieutenant colonels and colonels, and all due to the fact that one branch has been expanded by legislation faster than the other.

The Infantry is in nearly as bad a condition for the same reason. The officers of the Infantry are five years behind the Coast Artillery of the same length of service. The officers of the Field Artillery are two years behind the Coast Artillery. Now, take these series of ranks above, and this illustrates the percentage of the increased promotion which will result, due to the increase of the various arms which are made in this bill. For instance, we provide a total of 108 batteries of Field Artillery, an increase of 150 per cent in that branch, and we make an increase of 52 companies of Coast Artillery, giving an increase of about 35 per cent in that branch. And the Infantry gets an increase of 33⅓ per cent, while the Cavalry gets none at all in this bill and consequently no legislative promotion for its officers. That means that the senior officers of those three branches—Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, and Infantry—will be boosted substantially beyond the rank now held by their more unfortunate brethren of the Cavalry. The average Coast Artillery promotion would be 37½ per cent over his brother in the Cavalry; and in the Field Artillery, which branch we have vastly increased in this bill, there will be an advantage of 150 per cent over his less favored brother of the Cavalry and almost as great a boost over his equally unfortunate brother of the Infantry.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Just what does the gentleman mean by a "boost" of 150 per cent?

Mr. ANTHONY. It means an average increase of promotion. That also illustrates the amount of increase which has been made in the branch by this bill, and every increase in any branch of the service made by Congress shoves every officer in that branch just that much further up toward the top in the promotion which follows.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman consider these Cavalry officers are injured by virtue of the promotion of men in other branches of the service?

Mr. ANTHONY. Absolutely injured by giving one set of officers an advantage of legislation not shared by others.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does he not simply mean that they do not get, because their corps is not increased, what the other people get?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Where is the injury about that?

Mr. ANTHONY. The injury is that you deny them that equality of opportunity that we ought to afford to every man who enters the United States Army or its service.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not this the situation: That it so happens that there is more need for one branch of the service and as a result of that men go up faster; but is that any reason why you should undertake to help the other branch?

Mr. ANTHONY. Just the same as it would be unfair to give the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], with his great ability, one-third of the salary that is given to some of us who perform a much less service.

Mr. SHERLEY. But that is not what is occurring. The gentleman is not showing a situation whereby the Cavalry officer is penalized; he is simply showing a situation where there is not enough increase in the Cavalry to grant these promotions.

Mr. ANTHONY. So that his brother officers, many of them, draw much more pay and have much more allowance and have increased rank.

Mr. SHERLEY. But we are not concerned primarily in what an individual draws in pay.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, yes; we are.

Mr. SHERLEY. We are concerned in what he does.

Mr. ANTHONY. We are concerned in absolute justice to these men.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the justice lies in the fact that one man has under him a certain number of men which gives him a certain rank, and if the Cavalry have not enough men to make that rank, that does not matter.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Cavalry man would perform exactly the same service if he had the opportunity. These more fortunate gentlemen in the Field Artillery are favored by reason of fortunate legislation, not through any merit of their own.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it possible for a man in the Cavalry to be transferred to the Coast Artillery?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not possible for him to be transferred, for instance, to the Field Artillery by the provisions of this bill if he were above the grade of lieutenant, and it would not be further permitted under the provisions of this amendment. It is not the intention of this amendment to transfer from one branch of the service to another, although I think that up to the grade of field officer it is entirely feasible to interchange officers among the various branches of the service.

Mr. MADDEN. In the present circumstances the man in the Field Artillery would have 150 opportunities for promotion to 1 in the Cavalry?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the percentage of increase of the Field Artillery in the bill under consideration. He would have about that much advantage over a Cavalry man who started even with him 20 or 30 years ago, whatever it may be.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, let me see if I get the idea. Does that mean that in a service of 15 years a Cavalry man would only get as far as a Field Artillery man would get in 10 years? Is that the idea?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is exactly it. Even the ratio is greater than the gentleman states, if the proposed inequality is maintained. For instance, a man who left West Point 15 years ago—I think, in 1900—may be now a captain of the Cavalry, while his classmate who went into the Coast Artillery is generally a major and frequently a lieutenant colonel.

Mr. GARDNER. I entirely sympathize with the purpose of the amendment, but I do not quite understand it yet.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that I have not yet developed my argument to show the way in which we are going to use this detached list of 900 extra officers to partially remedy this distressing situation.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, along the line of what he just said, I desire to say that in 1901, the year he speaks of, a young man went from Albany into the Cavalry and has been in the service ever since. As a matter of fact, he entered the academy in 1897, and he is only a lieutenant of Cavalry. That is still worse than what the gentleman said, but I wanted to present the injustice of that proposition in a concrete case.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In partial reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky, suppose a Cavalry officer graduated 20 years ago and had now attained the rank of major——

Mr. ANTHONY. I fear it would not be possible——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And say he would be upon the field of action and be joined to another branch of troops commanded by a man who graduated 15 years ago who is a colonel. Who would be in command?

Mr. ANTHONY. He would be dominated by a man who graduated years after and his junior by years of service and experience.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is there any possible consistency or efficiency in that thing?

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. SHERLEY. Was not just the converse true many years ago in regard to the Cavalry?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do.

Mr. ANTHONY. Possibly it was; but what we want to avoid is the possibility of a recurrence of such a condition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it possible to have a single list?

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman has struck it. That is the ideal solution of the question. Until we can get the single list, which, I am informed, is the system adopted by France and by Germany up to the grade of field officer; after that it is selection; but until we can go that far I think we will have to adopt temporarily——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman intend to discuss the single-list idea?

Mr. ANTHONY. Because of the fact that it brought in so many complicated questions it was not deemed advisable by some of the committee to encumber the bill with it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But does the gentleman himself intend to discuss it?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. I will not be able to do so. Now, in this list of 900 extra officers which we have created the pending amendment authorizes the Secretary of War to make such use of them as he shall deem wise to bring about an equitable equalization of promotions in the different branches of the service as far as possible. We do not go to the point of exactly telling him how to do that, because there are some intricate individual situations to deal with, but we simply declare it to be the policy of Congress that he shall use this list of detached officers to remedy this condition as far as possible and leave it to his sense of justice to work out the method of so doing. I believe, and you can safely say that 90 per cent of the officers of all branches of the service believe, in the justice of equalization, and the only thing is for Congress to adopt some method of working it out. That suggested by the gentleman from New York would be the real way to reach the trouble if we could work it out, but in the absence of that I am asking the committee to adopt the recommendation of the Secretary of War as made to our committee on Saturday and whose language I am incorporating in this amendment. Of these 900 extra officers under this system of detailing them, the Cavalry would largely be the first officers to be detached in making up this list until we brought them up level with the promotion conditions in the Infantry. Then by increasing the list further and by the redetails which would follow we would endeavor to bring the Infantry up to the level of promotions in the Field Artillery, and then in further carrying out the idea we would bring up the Field Artillery to the level of the Coast Artillery until they are all materially equalized, although it would be impossible to bring about an absolute equity of promotion by the means at hand.

Mr. ROGERS. Will not the practical effect of this arrangement, if worked out, be that a major may perhaps command a company or conceivably a lieutenant colonel command a company, or troop, as the case may be?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I think not. I will say to the gentleman that the extra officers created by this paragraph will not be used for the purpose of commanding troops. These officers will be used for the purpose of instructing the National Guard and detailed on recruiting duty and to educational institutions.

Mr. SHERLEY. Would not the result of what the gentleman seeks give to a branch of the service a great deal more detached service than it would to the other branches, and would it not follow therefore that the department might be embarrassed in having to send cavalry officers for work or serving upon boards where there should be other representatives from other branches of the service, and does the gentleman not in curing one evil create another?

Mr. ANTHONY. The argument of the gentlemen would be correct if that is the only situation we were going to be confronted with, but what the gentleman says accentuates also that in increasing the Field Artillery, as provided in the bill, there will be ten times the vacancies in that branch to be filled from the bottom just the same as any vacancies made in the Cavalry in equalizing promotions by use of the detached officers' list would also have to be filled in by new appointments in the lowest grades.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would ask unanimous consent that I may have 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CURRY. I would like to ask why there is not one officers' roll in the Army, the same as there is in the Navy—why there are so many rolls. In the Navy they have one officers' roll for promotion. Why have they not the same in the Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. I can not say why they have not, but they simply have not.

Mr. CURRY. Would it not be the easiest way to reach this?

Mr. ANTHONY. It undoubtedly would, up to the grade of major. But I think the ideal solution would be promotion by selection above the grade of major on the merit system, and that we have not got.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will be very glad to do so.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman has said that this single-list system would be the correct system. If it is a correct system, why does not the gentleman offer it here and let us vote on it? What is the influence that prevents Congress from adopting this ideal system at this time?

Mr. ANTHONY. The objection to it is on account of the great number of individual cases, or constructive cases, that would have to be considered in framing the bill. In the report that was made to the committee at my request there were over 100 closely typewritten pages relisting the officers which would all have to be incorporated in a bill. And we threw up our hands.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is not also another reason why you did not consider the advisability, that the information given to the committee was that the different lines of the service required such additional information and duties that it would be injurious to the service to transfer these men at this time?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is exactly the position some of the officials at the department take.

Mr. SLEMP. If there is a vacancy in the position of a captain and a lieutenant is to be appointed, how would he under your system be selected?

Mr. ANTHONY. All from the bottom. Men are promoted and vacancies are filled from the bottom.

Mr. SLEMP. Does the length of service of the various lieutenants eligible to fill the vacancy have anything to do with the selection?

Mr. ANTHONY. They go according to their position on the list—according to the dates of their commission, and not according to the length of service.

Mr. BARKLEY. As to these men that come out of West Point, are they entitled to choose as to whether they shall go into the Cavalry, the Coast Artillery, or any other branch of the service?

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand a certain portion of the highest ranking men—that is, those who have shown the greatest proficiency in mathematics—are assigned to the Engineers. After that they are allowed more or less to express their preferences.

Mr. BARKLEY. And your theory is that if a graduate at West Point expresses preferences for the Cavalry he ought to be artificially boosted a little bit, because in the line of promotion he is placed behind his comrades?

Mr. ANTHONY. Congress has neglected the Cavalry in past years. All we ask is that an officer in the Cavalry be not penalized for serving in a branch of the service which we do not increase by legislation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Now let me ask you this: These officers of the Cavalry service are promoted as vacancies occur?

Mr. ANTHONY. In their branch.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then the result is that there are not as many vacancies occurring from year to year in the Cavalry as in the other branches?

Mr. ANTHONY. The same percentage of vacancies occur from natural causes probably, but here we are by wholesale legislation going to advance the Artillery branch vastly ahead of the other three branches, and this is simply a small effort to preserve some equality among officers of the same length of service and put them on a more equal footing.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the number comparatively the same?

Mr. ANTHONY. The different branches are officered proportionately about the same.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. TAGGART. It is the proportion of the officers mentioned in section 11, is it not?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is by use of the 900 extra officers which we create in that section that we wish to remove so far as possible this inequality which has crept into the service through the unequal additions that have been made there purely by legislation.

Mr. TAGGART. And your proposition is, regardless of what branch of the service a graduate of West Point may be assigned to, it has little or nothing to do with apportioning the men under section 11 of this bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not so far as I can see.

Mr. TILSON. What would the gentleman think of taking the so-called "time" plan and letting a man serve so many years in a grade and then promoting him, providing he takes and passes a certain examination?

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman means that he should go to a certain grade after a certain number of years have passed?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is an adequate remedy for the situation; but until we can get that my idea is to adopt the plan recommended by the department.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. I would like to know, as to these officers detached to this special service to teach the National Guard and to give instruction at the various colleges, whether the National Guard will be taught in cavalry, in infantry, field artillery, and coast artillery, and drilled and practiced so as to become efficient in that service?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman can rest assured that the War Department will seek to adapt its instruction for all arms of the service in the National Guard, as far as possible, in proper proportion.

Mr. KREIDER. I take it that a captain taken from the Cavalry is competent to teach in all the departments.

Mr. ANTHONY. Absolutely. One of the ideas of this amendment is that a situation may arise for the detail of a Cavalry or Infantry officer where an Artillery officer is thought necessary. That situation is provided for by a clause in my amendment which enables the Secretary of War to select the man who is best adapted for the service he is expected to perform, and to select him from the proper arm, as the duty may require.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. If you do not disregard the special fitness of officers, you will not get the full benefit for the Cavalry that you seek. The only way to get equalization is to detail more Cavalry than any other branch, and that results in one of two things—either your amendment fails or it gives to the Cavalry practically a monopoly of detail—and that would tend to lead to favoritism by the General Staff such as has not been heard of before.

Mr. ANTHONY. It would give a greater number of Cavalry officers on the detached list; but whenever it is necessary to detail a man from another branch of the service the Secretary of War is empowered to do that. This plan has the approval of the War Department, and is sent to the committee with the approval of the Secretary of War. I think it provides adequate relief for the evils which the gentleman knows to exist and which I know to exist. It does this in every grade, from that of second lieutenant to that of lieutenant colonel. Here, in a nutshell, is a statement of the case:

In every grade from second lieutenant to lieutenant colonel the Cavalry and Infantry officers next for promotion to the respective grade above are now years behind their contemporaries in either Artillery arm. This condition is due solely to legislation of recent years.

If the vacancies created by the present bill are filled in the manner provided in sections 11 and 14, the two retarded arms will be even farther behind in 1919 than at present. The provisos at the bottom of page 22 and top of page 23, section 11, not only do not equalize promotion but effectively prevent equalization in the future.

The proposed amendment tends toward an equitable equalization of promotion:

(a) It does not deprive any Artillery officer of the rapid promotion he has enjoyed to date, or of liberal further advancement under the present bill.

(b) It does not transfer any officer to an arm other than his own.

(c) It does not change the relative positions of officers in their own arms.

(d) It makes proper provision for details to the detached list from a special arm whenever such a course is necessary for the efficiency of the service.

(e) It does injustice to no one while materially lessening a condition of hardship that would otherwise handicap the careers of several hundred officers.

Those are the assertions of the board of officers that prepared the amendment, and I hope the House will adopt it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. SHERLEY. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. TILSON. It is a substitute for the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TILSON offers the following amendment: Strike out section 11 and insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 11. Subject to the examinations provided by law, the requirements of this act as to provisional appointments, and the exceptions provided by this act as to chaplains, dental surgeons, and officers of the Medical Corps, promotions among commissioned officers of the Regular Army shall take place on the completion of the following total years of service as a commissioned officer of the United States, to include service in the Regular Army, the Volunteers, the Navy, and the Marine Corps: Four years to the grade of first lieutenant, 12 years to the grade of captain, 21 years to the grade of major, 26 years to the grade of lieutenant colonel, and 30 years to the grade of general: Provided, That officers of the Medical Corps shall be credited with four years' constructive service for promotion to grades above that of captain: Provided further, That no credit shall be given time lost through failure on examination for promotion or through sentence of a court-martial. Those now holding an anomalous position through failure on examination for promotion shall lose one year for each such failure; those holding an anomalous position through sentence of a court-martial shall be given the constructive service of the officer whom they now follow on the lineal list. Those hereafter failing on examination for promotion shall lose one year for each such failure: Provided further, That rank in grade shall be according to total length of commissioned service, subject to the reduction for loss due to failure on examination for promotion or through sentence of a court-martial: Provided further, That the President may assign officers to command and duties in such manner as the exigencies of the service demand, subject to the rules of seniority provided by this act and the laws affecting detached service: Provided further, That hereafter all original appointments of commissioned officers of the Regular Army shall be to the grade of second lieutenant, except in the Medical Corps, Dental Corps, and chaplains, where original appointments shall be to the grade of first lieutenant: Provided further, That dental surgeons shall not be promoted beyond the grade of captain, nor chaplains beyond the grade of major: Provided further, That the original appointments of officers of the Medical Corps, the Dental Corps, and of chaplains shall be provisional, as hereinafter provided for second lieutenants: And provided further, That the President may, at his discretion and under such regulations as he may prescribe, retire any officer above the grade of lieutenant colonel after four years' service in his then grade, and no act now in force shall be so construed as to limit or restrict the retirement of officers as herein provided for, nor shall the provisions of this act be so construed as to reduce any officer in grade.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, this is the "time plan," so called, the "fixed-years-of-service plan." Before beginning debate I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if he is going to move to rise at 5 o'clock?

Mr. HAY. I shall not move to rise until we get through this section.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman desires to finish this section to-night?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. I will say, Mr. Chairman, very briefly, that this amendment simply provides that a man shall serve four years as second lieutenant before he can be promoted to first lieutenant; that he must serve 12 years altogether before he can be a captain; that he must serve 21 years before he can be a major; that he must serve 26 years before he can be a lieutenant colonel and 30 years before he can be a colonel. This would cure all the existing defects, so far as promotion is concerned. Hereafter there would need be no occasion for fights between the different arms of the service, and I am quite sure the combined arms would be in better situation to fight the enemy.

We have had this situation presented to the Committee on Military Affairs: We have had one arm of the service come to us, presenting their case and showing how necessary it was that their arm should be increased, incidentally giving them a considerable promotion when the increase was granted. The next Congress would see another arm of the service come in presenting their case and using the better situation of the increased arm as an instance of injustice to them unless a corresponding increase should also be given them, thereby securing an increase of their own arm and incidental promotion. Army officers are human, like the rest of us, with all the weaknesses and frailties of human nature. You can not blame a man for having an exalted opinion of the importance of his own arm, especially if that opinion will aid in giving him promotion.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. May I ask the gentleman whether the Committee on Military Affairs ever received a deputation from the enlisted men clamoring for additional pay and greater privileges?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know; but I know that the committee would be glad to receive them in case they presented themselves.

Mr. KEATING. The only applications for promotion and increased pay that were made to the committee came from the officers, did they not?

Mr. TILSON. I may say that the pressure has not come from officers for promotion, but for an increase in their particular arm of the service. The fact is, however, that increases make vacancies, and, of course, vacancies make promotions. By the plan I have proposed here they will not be looking for dead men's shoes or vacancies at all. An officer will be required to serve a fixed number of years faithfully and then pass the required examination before he can be promoted. By the terms of either the House bill or the Senate bill, unless some such provision as this is made, there will be men not yet in the service who within two years time will be promoted. In the Field Artillery arm of the service men will be promoted to high rank after very short service, whereas in the Infantry, and especially so in the Cavalry, men of long service will still be serving in the lower grade.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. Has the gentleman reference to the peace conditions at this time, or would he deny the officer of the Army who performed particular service in time of war or time of military activity in the Army, such as we now have in Mexico, promotion for brilliant service rendered?

Mr. TILSON. I think those promotions ought to be made, perhaps, by selection. We are not proceeding in that manner now, however. It is now entirely by seniority. A man gets his promotion, not because of any special fitness for it but because there is a vacancy above him. If he is ambitious, as he properly should be, he will be eagerly looking for the vacancy above him, which means promotion for him.

Mr. TAGGART. You can make no distinction, then, between conspicuous service, rendered perhaps under fire, which we may have any day in Mexico, and the ordinary humdrum of routine service.

Mr. TILSON. If I could have my way, I would make a great deal of distinction; but we do not under our present law and we do not in this bill.

Mr. TAGGART. There would be no exception, then, under your amendment?

Mr. TILSON. This amendment would not change that feature of the law at all. It would still be by length of service, whereas now it is simply by seniority and a vacancy. It would promote a few extra officers, especially in the Infantry and Cavalry, who have not received very much promotion recently. It would promote a few extra officers, who, of course, could be put on the extra list of officers and be assigned to schools, the National Guard, and so forth.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Kentucky have three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman state what advantage there is in the proposition he advances over a lineal list?

Mr. TILSON. This practically serves the same purpose as a single lineal list, except that a single list necessitates, perhaps, a transfer from one arm of the service to another, especially in the lower grades, while it is believed that under this plan, using our detached officers' list, or extra list, there need be no occasion for transferring a man from one arm of the service to the other.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Except that if a branch of the service like the Cavalry be not increased for a period of time, the troops may all be commanded by majors and officers of higher rank.

Mr. TILSON. There is a proviso to this amendment that the President can assign officers to commands as the exigencies of the service may demand. In other words, there might be a case where a regiment would be commanded by a major, and there might be occasions when a company would be commanded by a major, but there would be nothing very strange or objectionable in that. Other armies do practically the same thing, and have no trouble in regard to it.

So, gentlemen of the House, this is my proposition. By it we shall get rid of this troublesome question of promotion once and for all. It simply takes the average time in which an officer reaches the several grades from second lieutenant to the rank of colonel, and makes all officers conform to it. By doing so no officer of short service will outrank one of longer service. Vacancies in the grade above will lose their importance, greater satisfaction will prevail throughout the Army, and in the future when officers come before us to ask for an increase we shall not need to discount their recommendations by consideration of the degree of promotion such a change will bring about.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, for the last two or three years I have been thrown with all branches of the service in many sections of our country and abroad where our troops are serving. I have been with the Infantry, with the Coast Artillery, with the Field Artillery, with the Mountain Artillery, with the machine-gun branches of the various organizations, and with the Cavalry just incidentally. I have found that there is a widespread and universal dissatisfaction with the present method of promotion. The reason is that a man entering one branch of the service does not have the same chance for advancement that a man may have who enters another branch of the service; contingent not upon efficiency, not upon experience, not upon the value of officers to the military establishment, but dependent entirely upon some congressional action that will create advancement in one branch over that in another. From what I have been able to learn of the facts, which is not a tremendous amount, I am strong for a lineal list, and I do not believe you will ever get the matter successfully and satisfactorily settled until you adopt a lineal list.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman mean a single list?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. A single list.

Mr. KAHN. I understand that the War College has been trying to work out that problem for several years, and although they are all experienced soldiers they have not been able to agree on a plan,

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I was about to add, but the time when we can have such a list apparently is not here. In the meantime—and I confess it is rather a mean time—I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut. From what I can learn, the feeling that naturally exists in the minds of the layman, like myself, that the Cavalry officer can not be put in command of Infantry troops, is without foundation. The cavalryman is really a mounted infantryman, and he needs to know practically all the things that the Infantry officer needs to know, and the transfer from one to the other can be made without loss of efficiency and can be made successfully.

It is not quite so simple a matter, perhaps, but it is generally true of the ordinary cavalryman being transferred to the Field Artillery. At all events, changes from one branch to another could be successfully made if the law provided for it.

As we can not have the lineal list, and I say we can not have it, based on the statements made here to-day and other statements that I have heard during the last year or two, which we must accept, let us have something that will tend to equalize the opportunity of every man who gets a commission in the Army.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman from Minnesota, like other Members, has stated that we can not have it for some mysterious reason. Why can not we have it if it is a good thing?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I wish I could answer the gentleman, for I have been wondering about that myself.

Mr. KEATING. Is it because the officers will not permit us to have it?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think that is it, if the gentleman will permit me. I think it is due to the fact that there have been so many men on detached service, under the system we have had so long, that if it should be changed the sweep would result in numerous injustices to individual officers; and, pending the time they are getting this thing straightened out, and it seems to be pending a long time, we will have to let the matter remain in abeyance. I would be in favor, as far as I am concerned, of voting as many times as I could for a lineal list.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I came here to-day to listen to this debate under the impression that the bill was intended to provide for the national defense. After listening to the debate I have become convinced that one of the main objects of the bill—if not the main object—is to provide promotions for officers in the United States Army.

Apparently from the intimations thrown out by the members of the committee and the allusions by Members of the House there is some mysterious power which will not give us the kind of law we should have—an influence which is potent with members of the committee and Members of the House.

I think it is very significant, Mr. Chairman, that in all the speeches made here it has never been shown that the enlisted men of the United States Army have sought in any way to embarrass the members of this committee with suggestions as to what should be done for them. They seem to be quite satisfied to go on and do the fighting. There is no proposition that their pay shall be increased, no proposition that their allowance shall be increased, no worry about promotions for them; "Tommy Atkins" can take care of himself. But there seems to be a tremendous potter around here for fear some second lieutenant of Cavalry will not be promoted when some second lieutenant in the Coast Artillery gets an increase in pay.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman realize that the average enlisted man has a more frequent and abundant opportunity for promotion than the officers do, because there is a change in the personnel in the enlisted ranks every four years whereas the officers go into the service for a lifetime.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the enlisted men of the United States Army will be delighted to learn from the distinguished gentleman from Vermont that their position is so much more fortunate and desirable than that of the officers of the United States Army. I think you will find, if you consult the enlisted men of the Army, that they would be very glad to exchange places with these unfortunate officers who have not the same chances for promotion that the enlisted men have.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I will.

Mr. CANNON. Would the gentleman be in favor of paying every man in the ranks to begin with the pay of a second lieutenant?

Mr. KEATING. No.

Mr. CANNON. Then my friend is not the friend of the people that he claims to be. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING. I am not a friend of the people to the same extent as the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Mr. Chairman, the point to which I wanted to attract the attention of the House was the great amount of time we devote to taking care of the interests of the officers and the very small amount of time we devote to taking care of the interests of the privates in this Army of ours.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I have had some knowledge of human beings who were always "looking for the man under the bed," but as a general thing they wore petticoats. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, adverting to the practical side of this proposition, without any attempt at demagogy, without any attempt at arraigning two classes in the same service in antagonistic relation toward one another, the fact is that the enlisted man and the officers supplement and complement each other. They are each useless without the other, but each by reason of the special character and nature of the service that he performs is placed on different lines, related particularly to that special service and the best means of obtaining it. The officer gives up his lifetime to the service of his country in the Army. He disavows any other profession, and under the law is not eligible to have any other occupation while he is in the military service. That is the reason that when he arrives at the age of 64 years he is eligible to be retired, because he has lost his opportunity to be in any other gainful occupation through all the greater part of the years of his active life. On the other hand, the enlisted man is only enlisted for a short period. It may be with him purely an experiment. He may come in and go out, come in and go out, just as he pleases; and it follows as the night the day that with the Army, as with all other interests of men generally, there are a great many changes. Young boys go into the service, find it is not to their liking, and go out. Some men stay in for a short period and find they have had enough, and go out. There are constant vacancies and opportunities for change and advancement in the enlisted personnel that do not exist in a corps where all the men go into it for the purpose of making it a life occupation and where most of them do. That is the simple thing. It is not a question of favoritism one way or the other.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not wish to convey to the House or the country the impression that when a man graduates from West Point he must remain in the Army until he is 64 years of age?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I mean to convey this suggestion, which everyone knows, that if a man goes to West Point for four years to fit himself for the Army it is obvious that he intends to make the Army his life occupation.

Mr. KEATING. But it is not the fact; it does not result in that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Practically it does; yes.

Mr. KEATING. Whenever he sees an opportunity to better himself he resigns and gets out.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He can not get out until the end of eight years.

Mr. KEATING. Does the gentleman mean that he can not resign with the approval of the Secretary of War?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the Secretary of War approves, he may.

Mr. KEATING. And those requests have not been denied?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. They have been denied many times. Would the gentleman undertake to convey by innuendo and inference that instead of men on the average staying in the service after graduation, the tendency is to go out?

Mr. KEATING. No.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He is then only referring to individual instances. Ninety-five per cent at least stay in.

Mr. KEATING. I think the gentleman's percentage is entirely too high.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is an obligation required by law, and it is an obligation required by the splendid standard of honor which is taught at that academy and at every fireside in the land. [Applause.] All I care to protest against, Mr. Chairman—and with all good nature toward my friend from Colorado [Mr. KEATING]—is simply the innuendo and insinuation that a committee of men who endeavor in their efforts to improve the Army to be as honorable as the Army is toward the country in its high and exalted standards of service should labor under the suspicion that because they present here something that the gentleman from Colorado can not quite see through there must be a "nigger in the woodpile."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the end of 10 minutes all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that at the end of 10 minutes all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close. Is there objection?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman make that 15 minutes? I would like to have about 7 minutes.

Mr. HAY. All right; I will make it 15 minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of amendments I would like to offer which will take very little time to debate, and I would like to get them in within that time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request; but I will give notice that I am going to stay until we finish this section.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, possibly I shall make myself the target for some verbal attack by audibly wondering whether the present system of promotion is responsible for what apparently is a somewhat total lack of inventive genius on the part of Army officers. I have been more or less acquainted with congressional matters for 10 years and I have listened to debates on Army bills, read periodicals, and things of that sort, and I do not recall any statement on the floor of this House—and I think it would have been made if facts had justified it—that Army officers have made any very valuable or material inventions to add to the efficiency of our Army. Now, I read a good deal in the newspapers about the French 75-centimeter gun, the Italian 76 and the "Busy Berthas," and everything of that sort, but, as far as I can recall, I do not remember that officers of our Army have added very much to the efficiency of our Army in the way of inventions.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman should not overlook the Crozier disappearing gun carriage.

Mr. BENNET. I am glad to hear of that carriage. I am frank to admit my ignorance on the subject, and I am glad to have it brought to the attention of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. These men are not educated to become inventors but to become fighters.

Mr. BENNET. Ah, yes; but, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois was responsible for something of far more merit to the Army than any Army officer. I refer to the aeroplane, because we forget that for 10 years the gentleman from Illinois faced the ridicule of the united press of the whole United States, year after year, when chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in reporting an item to the House to give $25,000 each year to Prof. Langley to perfect the aeroplane.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly, in just one moment. That was the result of the efforts of the gentleman from Illinois, who was not educated to be an inventor but was educated to be a statesman and a friend of us all. His efforts have given us this most marvelous military arm which has gotten to the point of an almost perfect system.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me. I could not make a hoe handle, and yet I was acquainted with Prof. Langley and believed in him——

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And he did make the invention.

Mr. BENNET. But the gentleman had, what we called in New York when I was a boy, the "guts" to report out an appropriation year after year, and stand the ridicule of the Nation, and as a result we have got the airship.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I will yield.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman recall the fact that Col. Ormond Lissak, who was an officer of the Army, invented the machinery for making cartridges?

Mr. BENNET. I am perfectly willing to stand and say that I am ignorant of those things, and that I am seeking information and have already obtained information of two inventions within the recollection of the gentleman from California, who has been on the Committee on Military Affairs—how long?

Mr. KAHN. Twelve years.

Mr. BENNET. Twelve years.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. TAGGART. Granting the fact that the gentleman from Illinois, who has served here longer than any other man in the House, has done the greatest service to his country in aiding the development of the aeroplane, is not it a fact that there is not a military or naval weapon, with the exception of the Zeppelin and the asphyxiating gas, that has not been invented by an American, and that one of the things that shocks civilization at this hour is the dreadful efficiency of military weapons. I think our Army officers have got enough to do without adding to the horrors of the present efficiency of the means of destruction, and they should not be criticized because they have not provided us with a great many new weapons with which to kill folks.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAGGART. And they should not be criticized because they have not found something new to kill folks with.

Mr. BENNET. I disagree entirely with the gentleman from Kansas. The business of war is to kill people, and kill them as fast as they can in time of war.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman has overlooked the Lewis machine gun, has he not?

Mr. BENNET. Was that the gun they talked about this afternoon, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] said that they had tested and it had not worked?

Mr. GARDNER. But it is working in the British Army. It is probably the best machine gun in the world.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks ananimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Just to revert to the Navy for a minute. When Ericsson invented the Monitor, it took a civilian, Abraham Lincoln, to have it even used, and the Navy tied such red tape around it that men, also civilians, had to give a bond not only that the Monitor would be built but that the Monitor would succeed. And a gentleman who served with us here for years, Mr. Sperry, of New Haven, was one of the five or six men that risked his personal fortune because of that objection on the part of experts.

Just one more thing, and I will yield to my colleague. After the close of the war of 1812 we developed the modern one-gun ship, and yet the Navy let it rot at the wharves and persisted in the old system. I am not particularly criticizing, but I am wondering whether the system of promotion, which puts a man in as a midshipman and runs him up to admiral, and puts him in as a cadet and runs him up to major general, and where he knows that a certain amount of money will go to his credit on the books, does not deaden the efficiency?

Mr. PLATT. Our colleague from New York [Mr. SNYDER] said that there was a factory in his district making 300 of these Lewis machine guns a day.

Mr. BENNET. If we are making 300 Lewis machine guns in New York to-day for the British Army and we need machine guns for work in Texas and Mexico, why can we not get them?

Mr. COX. The gentleman is making an interesting statement, and, I think, in a measure a true statement. There is a gentleman named Simmons living in his district, in the city of New York, who, in my judgment—and I am not an expert by any means—has worked out a torpedo that will carry 23,000 yards. He submitted it to the Navy Department, and they turned their backs on him.

Mr. BENNET. Not only that, but they called him crazy.

Mr. COX. And there is another thing, they will take it in Germany unless he is too late in getting there.

Mr. BENNET. That is about the sum and substance of what I wanted to say, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] has put what you might call a cap on it.

Mr. HILLIARD. I would like to ask the gentleman if he had heard of the French "75" and the "Busy Lizzies" before this war?

Mr. BENNET. I had heard of the French "75s," but I did not hear of the "Busy Berthas" until after the war had commenced. I will ask the gentleman a question. Let him name one invention made by the officers of the Regular Army during the period between 1861 and 1865, when we did have a war.

Mr. HILLIARD. May I also refer to the fact that I am a Yankee, and ask another question? Has there been any opportunity to develop anything of that kind since that time?

Mr. BENNET. I was talking about the time between 1861 and 1865.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, coming back to the matter before the House, I trust the House will not agree to the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], because it will, without going further into the merits, swell the retired list of the Army to an enormous proportion, and everyone knows that the retired list is large enough now. I think for that reason, if for no other, the amendment ought to be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANTHONY: Strike out the proviso beginning on line 24, page 23, ending on line 9, page 24, referring to the Porto Rico regiment, and insert, after the word "relieved," on line 14, page 25, the following: "The lieutenant colonel and three majors of said regiment shall be appointed from the senior captains in regimental rank of the Porto Rico regiment mentioned in the act of March 4, 1915, and the captains of the Porto Rico regiment mentioned in said act shall also be eligible for such detached service or transfer as may be directed by the Secretary of War."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, does not that apply to the two sections of the bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. It applies to the two provisions of the same section. It strikes out the first provision in reference to the Porto Rico regiment, which is in direct conflict with the second provision, and it amplifies the second provision in relaton to the same subject.

Mr. HAY. As the Clerk read it, I understood it referred to line 14, page 25, which is in section 12 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the way it reads.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I will ask, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk read the first part of the amendment, which strikes out the provision in relation to the Porto Rico regiment, in section 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the proviso, beginning on line 24, page 23, and ending on line 9, page 24, referring to the Porto Rico regiment.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. HAY. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read section 12.

Mr. HAY. Read section 12, and then I will move to rise.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the Porto Rico regiment of Infantry of the United States Army shall hereafter have the same organization and the same grades and numbers of commissioned officers and enlisted men as are by this act or shall hereafter be prescribed by law for other regiments of Infantry of the Army. All vacancies created by this act or occurring hereafter in commissioned offices of said regiment above the grade of second lieutenant and below the grade of colonel shall be filled by promotion according to seniority in the several grades and within the regiment, subject to the examination prescribed by section 3 of the act of Congress approved October 1, 1890, and said section is hereby extended so as to apply in the cases of all officers below the grade of lieutenant colonel, who shall hereafter be examined for promotion in the Porto Rico regiment of Infantry, except that the President may prescribe such a system of examination for the promotion of officers of said regiment as he may deem advisable. The colonel of said regiment shall be detailed by the President, from among officers of Infantry of the Army not below the grade of lieutenant colonel, for a period of four years unless sooner relieved. Vacancies created by this act or occurring hereafter in the grade of second lieutenant in said regiment shall be filled during any calendar year by the appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of any native of Porto Rico graduated from the United States Military Academy during that year, and, after such appointment shall have been made or provided for, by like appointment of native citizens of Porto Rico between 21 and 27 years of age.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, pending that, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech by the Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE in Lynn, Mass., March 16, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech by Senator LODGE, made in Lynn, Mass., on March 16.

Mr. FOSTER. What is this request—for publishing what?

The CHAIRMAN. A speech made by Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, in Lynn, Mass., on March 16.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the subject?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. The general subject, politics.

Mr. BORLAND. The mistakes of the Democratic Party.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12766, the Army reorganization bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LITTLEPAGE, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. GRIFFIN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa (on request of Mr. TOWNER), indefinitely, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 21, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, in all the seven years since I came to the Senate I do not think that a measure has been seriously proposed, and a great measure at that, which has as little reason behind it as the present proposition that the United States Government shall enter upon the business of manufacturing armor. For nearly a quarter of a century the armor-plate manufacturers of the country have been the targets of abuse from the seats of Senators and Representatives in Congress, of demagogues upon the hustings, and almost universally from the press of the country. The charges have been made and the impression created that they have been in a systematic way taking advantage of their position to rob the Government; that their charges have been exorbitant, their methods base; that they have sold continuously—and the word "continuously" has been repeated over and over again—to other Governments at greatly less prices than they have charged to their own country. So widespread, Mr. President, have been these charges that it is impossible that they should not have had a great effect upon public opinion.

All the armor plate produced in this country is manufactured in the great State which I have the honor in part to represent, and I will confess that until it became my duty to investigate the matter in connection with this very proposition I myself was under the impression that there must be some foundation at least for some of these charges. I simply reasoned from the old adage that where there was so much smoke there must be some fire.

The result of my investigation has been most astounding to me, and I am prepared to lay down the proposition and to stand by it, and I think I can prove it beyond cavil, that there is not one particle of proof for any of the charges, and, as I firmly believe, that there is no foundation in fact for any of them. I think I will prove that from the very beginning of this industry the United States Government has purchased its armor, all things considered, at fair and reasonable prices. At all events, I defy anyone to prove to the contrary, except upon suppositions and nothing more.

I can dismiss in a few words the charge that they have been defrauding our Government by selling to other countries at greatly lower prices. To begin with, it seems to me, Mr. President, that instead of this industry being selected as something that ought to be abolished and ruined, it should receive, if not charitable, at least fair and reasonable consideration at the hands of the Government.

There are three manufacturers of armor plate in this country. One of them came in of late years of its own accord. The other two did not want to manufacture armor. They entered the business and invested their money not only at the request but at the insistence of the Navy Department.

On this proposition, as on all others, I will rely for my argument upon recorded facts and not upon suppositious theories. In the report of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs of this Congress, headed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], on page 2 there occurs the following:

Secretary Whitney induced the Bethlehem Co. to enter upon the manufacture of armor, it having one of the largest iron plants in the country; and the price agreed on varied from five to six hundred dollars per ton. The Bethlehem Co. and the Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. were the only two concerns that bid at all. Whitney did not make a close or tight bargain, as he knew the company must necessarily be put to large expense, and he was willing to allow a liberal price on that account. He felt that it was desirable, if not absolutely necessary, that we should have armor manufacturers in the United States; and his successor, Mr. Tracy, felt that there should be more than one concern in the business, and he induced the Carnegie Steel Co. to enter it. There was a dispute with the Carnegie Co. about the price. Mr. Carnegie insisted he must receive the same price the Bethlehem people were getting or he would not touch it.

Then, again, in the Senate hearings Mr. Grace, the president of the Bethlehem Steel Co., testifies:

The armor-plate capacity of the country at that time—

This was after his company had entered the business—

The armor-plate capacity of the country at that time was not sufficient to meet the needs and requirements of the new naval program. We were specially requested—almost commanded—to increase, or to double, rather, our producing capacity at that time. That was in 1902.

Then, again, in the course of the same hearings—

The chairman—

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]—

The CHAIRMAN. How came the Bethlehem Co. to go into the manufacture of armor?

Mr. GRACE. In cooperation with the United States Government. The Government needed armor, and the Bethlehem Steel Co. thought it would be a profitable industry to enter. I presume that was what was in their minds.

Again, in the course of the same hearings:

Senator PENROSE. Of course, when the Bethlehem Co. went into this enterprise they were taking a risk, because there was no assurance of a Government policy?

Mr. GRACE. Other than the representations given to us by the then existing officers of the Government, and which were given us continuously up to the present administration; that they desired the industry development; that they desired to develop it with us.

Again, in the course of the same hearings Mr. Grace says:

We entered this business expecting the cooperation of the United States Government in its development; we increased our investment in the business on request from the United States Government; we have passed through more than one investigation to determine whether or not the business was being conducted on a basis fair to the Government, and I submit that in no case have these investigations shown anything but the most liberal treatment of the Government by all of the companies engaged in making armor.

In the report of the investigating committee appointed under the act of June 30, 1914, I find this in the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. There was no place in the United States that could make armor at all—

This comes from the Senator from South Carolina, who I am sorry is not here—

The CHAIRMAN. There was no place in the United States that could make armor at all—that was equipped to make it. The Secretary of the Navy, in looking around, picked out Bethlehem as the most likely company to engage in the making of armor, and after talking it over the Secretary induced the superintendent or the manager at that time to enter upon the construction or the manufacture of armor plate, and they agreed on a price.

Again:

The CHAIRMAN. Digging down in my memory for some other ancient history, I recall very distinctly that the Carnegie Co. were induced by a subsequent Secretary, or the next Secretary of the Navy, to enter into the manufacture of armor plate, too, because the Government felt that it would be better to have two competing companies than to be subject to the exactions of one.

Mr. President, in 1905 an act of Congress directed an investigation on the part of the officers of the Navy as to the prices charged for armor plate; a board was appointed, headed by Admiral Niles, of the Navy, and that board made a thorough and searching investigation into the subject. In the report filed by that board, called the Niles report, we find the following—and this comes from Admiral Niles himself:

Despite this anticipatory preparation, and the vigor with which the work was pushed, it was not until the summer of 1891 that the Bethlehem Co. was able to forge its first armor plate, nor did it make its first delivery under the contract until the autumn of that year. In the meantime the naval building program continued to expand, and the summer of 1890 found the department confronted with a prospective early need for some 14,000 tons of armor plate and but one plant, partly prepared, to produce it. In this emergency negotiations were entered into with Carnegie, Phipps & Co. (now the Carnegie Steel Co.), looking toward the establishment of a second source of domestic armor supply. It was not until November, 1890, that Carnegie, Phipps & Co. finally consented to enter into this new field.

Further along in the Niles report the admiral said:

The establishment of the armor plant of the Carnegie Steel Co. was hesitatingly undertaken at the instigation of the Navy Department in 1890, as part of its Homestead Steel Works, then, as now, but one of a number of works embraced in this company, that is itself to-day a subsidiary company of the United States Steel Corporation. In 1902–3 the capacity of this plant was practically doubled to meet the then urgent need of the department for more rapid deliveries, but even with its present output of something over 10,000 tons per year it forms only a small part of the Homestead Steel Works, having a total yearly output of some 2,000,000 tons.

So, Mr. President, I argue from this that this industry having been created and the enormous capital invested in it having been invested at the urgency of the United States Government, and the plants being practically, to a large extent, useless for any other purpose, and the armor manufacturers having no other market for their product, it ill becomes the Government to lightly turn all these things aside and to enter, not into competition, as is charged, but into extirpation of those plants which are objects of the Government's own creation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OLIVER. I yield.

Mr. REED. I merely wish to get a bit of information from the Senator, who is very well posted on this question.

Mr. OLIVER. I shall be very glad to give it.

Mr. REED. Is the Carnegie Co. a branch of the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, yes; that is well known.

Mr. REED. They are practically one, but have two corporate existences?

Mr. OLIVER. The Carnegie Steel Co. is one of the many subsidiaries of the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. REED. It is the United States Steel Corporation that makes the armor plate. Is that correct, or is it the Carnegie Co.?

Mr. OLIVER. It is the Carnegie Steel Co. which does that.

Mr. REED. It is the Carnegie Steel Co., a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation, which makes the armor plate?

Mr. OLIVER. It is the Carnegie Steel Co. which does that. In this connection, I would say, Mr. President, that in all of these hearings neither the Carnegie Steel Co. nor the United States Steel Corporation was in any way represented. The two corporations which have been combating this measure—if I may use that term—are the Bethlehem Steel Co. and the Midvale Steel Co. Neither of these companies, the Bethlehem nor the Midvale, is as is well known by those who are familiar with the subject, in any way connected with the United States Steel Corporation, or with each other.

Mr. REED. While the Senator has been so kind as to yield to me——

Mr. OLIVER. I shall be glad to yield at any time.

Mr. REED. The Senator made a statement a few moments ago that there had been but one company engaged in the manufacture of armor plate, and that, at the solicitation of the Government, two other companies entered that business, one of them being the Midvale and the other being the Bethlehem Co.

Mr. OLIVER. The other was the Carnegie Co.

Mr. REED. Was not that company in the business at the beginning?

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator from Missouri evidently did not understand my basic statement. I will endeavor to make it more clear to him. It was not that one company was in the business and that at the request of the Government two other companies came in, but it was that no company was in the business, and that not alone at the request but at the insistence of the Government the Bethlehem Co. entered into this branch of manufacture and invested its money. Some years later the Government, feeling that it was better to have more than one supply, not only induced the Bethlehem Co. to double its plant, but after a long course of argument it induced Mr. Carnegie to allow his company also to enter upon the manufacture of armor plate. So that there is no corporation engaged in this business except the Midvale Steel Co., which entered into the business of its own accord. The Midvale Co., 15 years after the Bethlehem Co. had engaged in the manufacture of armor, entered into the business of its own accord as a competitor of the two companies already engaged in it.

Mr. REED. So it entered upon the business voluntarily?

Mr. OLIVER. It entered upon it voluntarily.

Mr. REED. And we do not owe any moral obligation to them?

Mr. OLIVER. No; I do not contend that we owe a moral obligation to them.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, on that point, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I think that the Government advertised for bids and that the Midvale Co. responded to the advertisement.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, of course; but they entered the business of their own accord.

Mr. REED. What was the reason the Government desired another competitor? Was it because the Government felt that it was being charged too great prices, or was it simply because the companies which then existed were not capable of producing a sufficient amount of armor, or was it both?

Mr. OLIVER. The impression that I gain, Mr. President, from my examination of the records is that the object of the Government in inducing the Carnegie Steel Co. to enter into the manufacture was not because of the question of prices at all; it was because the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Tracy, saw that, with the growth of the Navy, it was better to have more than one source of supply, even if the one concern then manufacturing armor plate would expand its works. So at that time he not only induced the Bethlehem Steel Co. to double its capacity, but he also induced the Carnegie Steel Co. to engage in the manufacture of armor. I do not find—at least I do not now recollect of seeing anything up to that time, which was about 1890, in the shape of a complaint of the prices charged.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, another charge that is flaunted all over the country is that the companies producing armor plate have been selling to other nations at lower prices than those at which they were furnishing armor plate to their own Government. This charge has as little foundation—I might say less foundation than the charge of extortionate prices, because what I would say about the charge that they were exacting exorbitant prices from the Government is that it certainly is not proven, while the charge that they have consistently sold to other Governments at less prices than they have sold to our own is conclusively disproven.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. Before the Senator gets too far away from the other subject, I should like to ask him a question or two. As I understood the Senator, in the beginning the Government induced the one company to enter upon the manufacture of armor plate and the price was agreed upon. How long did that condition of things exist without bids being called for?

Mr. OLIVER. Well, of course, as long as there was only one producer. As I understand, the Government has asked bids ever since there were two competitors. As soon as the Carnegie Steel Co. was able to manufacture armor, from that time forward, as I understand, the Government has asked for bids.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator think, from his own examination, that one of the objects of the Government in asking that somebody else should manufacture armor was in order that there might be competition?

Mr. OLIVER. I have no doubt that that was in the mind of the officials of the Government.

Mr. WORKS. At how early a time did the complaints about high prices commence to be made?

Mr. OLIVER. My recollection is that they commenced along in the early nineties.

Mr. WORKS. That was about the time when the other company was induced to enter into the manufacture of armor plate?

Mr. OLIVER. My recollection, I will say to the Senator, is that there was not much complaint of the price as long as there was only one producer. I am relying now more on my recollection than I am on an examination of the records. I have been somewhat familiar with conditions in this industry ever since it started, having lived right at the seat of the industry, and my impression is that the complaint of high prices began along in 1892 or 1893 or 1894, when the steel business was at an extremely low ebb. Out of deference to my friends on the other side of the Chamber, I will not state what I think was the cause of that condition; but when it was found that the Government was paying between $500 and $600 per ton for armor plate when steel billets were selling at $15 a ton, it naturally aroused inquiry, and it was taken for granted that such a price must be an exorbitant one, not considering the fact that the same investment and the same power that was behind the armor-plate plant that would make at that time about 3,000 tons of armor a year would make more than 300,000 tons of steel billets.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator how the prices which he has mentioned and which were complained of compared with the original prices agreed upon between the Government and the Bethlehem Co.?

Mr. OLIVER. I think they were about the same.

Mr. WORKS. About the same. If the Senator will pardon me a moment further, I may be anticipating what he is going to say, but this occurred to my mind——

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator will permit me, while we are on that subject, I will state that I have a table here which will give the information, but which I did not intend to use directly in that connection.

Mr. WORKS. Very well. The Senator may pass that for the present. When did the question first arise as to whether there was really any bona fide competition between these three companies?

Mr. OLIVER. I think that has been a moot question ever since. It arose in this way: The Midvale Steel Co. began the manufacture of armor plate in the year 1904, I think. They had bid a lower price than the other two companies, about three years before that. Their bid was rejected because they had no plant. They then went to work and constructed a plant, and while that plant was under construction they put in another bid which was lower than the others, I think something about $398. At any rate, it was lower than the other two had been furnishing the armor plate for. The Government accepted their bid, gave them a part of the contract, and informed the other two manufacturers that they would have to come in at the same price.

Mr. REED. What year was that?

Mr. OLIVER. I think that was in October, 1903.

Mr. WORKS. I have gathered, from some things that have been said here—and I am asking these questions for information——

Mr. OLIVER. I realize that.

Mr. WORKS. For I have very little knowledge on the subject—it has been claimed here, as I understand, that these companies must cooperate in order to produce what the Government desires; that some part of the work is done by one, and some by another. Is that so?

Mr. OLIVER. No; that is not so. I think that in the case of the work that is now going on—I am not certain that this is exactly the case—my impression is that in the case of the large contract for the battleships now being constructed, the bid of the Carnegie Steel Co. was higher, and it received no part of the contract; but the award being greater than the capacity of the other two, that they had taken a part of it as subcontractors.

Mr. WORKS. Then it is simply a question of capacity and not the construction of one part of what is needed by one, and another part by the other?

Mr. OLIVER. Any one of these three concerns can make armor plate from the very beginning to the end.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the Senator say right there how the combined capacity of the three plants compares with the ordinary requirements of the Government?

Mr. OLIVER. The combined capacity of the three plants is about 25,000 tons a year. The ordinary requirements of the Government have been something like one-third of that.

Mr. HUGHES. Does the Senator know how these plants dispose of the balance of their product?

Mr. OLIVER. They do not dispose of it. They do not have any balance.

Mr. HUGHES. They do not run to their full capacity, then?

Mr. OLIVER. They do not run to their full capacity. That is the reason why their cost runs up so high. I will say to the Senator that I shall allude to that further along.

Mr. HUGHES. Somebody brought out a situation here yesterday which was a little bit of a surprise to me, although I am fairly familiar with the way in which the average Government officials operate. Under that, it seems difficult to see how they could avoid a certain amount of cooperation between these competing plants. As I understood the situation, whether the bid of a given plant was high or low, the work was divided in any event.

Mr. OLIVER. I will say to the Senator that it has been the policy of the Navy Department to divide up the work between these three plants, and on that account the prices paid to them have been substantially the same.

Mr. PITTMAN and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield, and to whom?

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. In 1915 the amount of tonnage was 16,256 tons. There was no one plant that could take that contract, was there?

Mr. OLIVER. No; no one plant is large enough to take that.

Mr. PITTMAN. And if one plant had bid for it and obtained the contract, it would have been necessary for it to divide it with either one of the other two, or with both of them?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is the position we are now in, is it not?

Mr. OLIVER. Surely.

Mr. PITTMAN. There are 26,000 tons each year required, I believe, and there are only three plants in the United States, and the Senator says they have a combined capacity of 25,000 tons. Consequently it would make no difference which one of those plants bid; the work would have to be divided up between all of them, would it not?

Mr. OLIVER. I will state to the Senator that, although a contract for 26,000 tons is being awarded this year, it is not the expectation of the Government that 26,000 tons will be manufactured this year. The keels of the battleships for which this armor is intended are not laid yet.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; but there is no one plant that could take that order now and build it, with the present capacity of the plants?

Mr. OLIVER. Not within a year.

Mr. PITTMAN. They would have to enlarge the plants?

Mr. OLIVER. Furthermore, it is not intended that one plant shall do this work. These people were invited by the Government to go into this business. They were not only invited, but they were almost forced into it. The Government, therefore, has followed the policy of keeping all of them busy as nearly as it could, and from that policy has arisen the similarity, the almost identity, of the bids that have been received. It is universally charged that it is the result of collusion. There is no evidence whatever of collusion between them. It is simply the result of the policy that has been followed by the Government for 25 years.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, is there any object in competitive bidding between these companies when the amount of the order would have to be divided between them to be carried out in any event?

Mr. OLIVER. It has not always been so. As a rule, the requirements of the Government have not come up to more than one-third of the capacity of these three plants. Consequently there would be a great object in one of the plants bidding much lower than the others, because they could make 10,000 tons of armor a year very much cheaper than they could make 3,000 tons, and as a result of that they would bid much lower for 10,000 tons if they knew they were going to get all of it. But they knew they were not going to get all of it, as a matter of fact.

Mr. PITTMAN. Take the year 1915. What would be the incentive for competitive bidding on 16,000 tons?

Mr. OLIVER. To keep their plant busy.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand, though, that they would have to give a part of that order to the other plants.

Mr. OLIVER. They would have to give them what they could not make, and that is just what they are doing.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then the other plants would be assured of having their part of that order?

Mr. OLIVER. Not their share. They would have as much of that order as the successful competitor might see fit to give them, which would be just exactly what he could spare and no more.

Mr. PITTMAN. Under the present order of 26,000 tons how would it be divided?

Mr. OLIVER. That is a question which the Senator ought to ask of somebody who knows more about the subject than I do.

Mr. REED and Mr. WORKS addressed the Chair.

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator has said that it has been the policy of the Navy Department to divide up this work between the different companies. If that be so, it seems to me there would be very little advantage in competitive bids. Now, however, I understand the Senator to say, in answer to the Senator from Nevada, that the division is made by the company that is successful in the bidding. That makes quite a different case.

Mr. OLIVER. That only applies to this one large contract. The contract, as I understand, was awarded part to the Bethlehem Co. and part to the Midvale Co. One of these companies found that the part of it that was awarded to them was greater than their capacity within the time in which it would have to be delivered, and they sublet that part of the contract to the Carnegie Steel Co.

Mr. WORKS. What I should like to be assured about is whether it was the general policy of the Navy Department to make this division itself, giving a part of it to one and a part of it to another?

Mr. OLIVER. My impression is, but I am not sure, that this is the first instance in which the division has been made other than by the Navy Department.

Mr. WORKS. Of course, the companies themselves are aware of this policy of the Government. Does the Senator think that under those circumstances competitive bidding amounts to very much?

Mr. OLIVER. I am free to say that I do not think it does; and I am not here to defend the Navy Department, although I have no doubt in the world that the different Secretaries of the Navy did what was best for the country according to the best information they had. What I am here for is to defend these business men from the rank and unfounded charges that have been made against them.

Mr. WORKS. I hope the Senator will not assume that I am taking any such position as that, because I do not know anything about whether these charges are reasonable or unreasonable. I was only trying to get at the facts respecting the competitive bidding that took place.

Mr. OLIVER. The tenor of the questions asked by the Senator from California shows that he is simply after information, and nothing more, and I am very willing to give it to him as far as I have it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just in order to clear up a matter, the Senator has stated the policy of the Navy Department to have been to parcel out the work among the various factories, the result being that by virtue of that policy competition was partially, if not totally, killed. I desire to ask the Senator if he claims that that has been the policy of the present Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. OLIVER. It has not been. The policy of the present Secretary of the Navy has been to induce competition.

Mr. REED. Is it not true that with that policy of the present Secretary of the Navy existing these three companies came in and bid on the same day, at the same hour, the same amount to the exact cent?

Mr. OLIVER. I have no doubt it is.

Mr. REED. Then can the Senator fairly say that the lack of competitive bidding now is the result of a policy of the Navy Department; but, on the other hand, is it not perfectly manifest that it is the result of combination?

Mr. OLIVER. I see no evidence of combination in that, except what might naturally arise from the identity of the bids.

Mr. REED. But is not that sufficient?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. I am willing to yield to the Senators, but the Senators must yield to me the right to finish what I started to say.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. OLIVER. It must be remembered that this was the result of close and careful figuring, and that they were figuring down to the lowest price at which they thought they could afford to do the work. I will say, from my examination of this record, that considering the fact that they would not have sufficient work to run their plants full, I believe it was the lowest price at which they could do the work at a profit.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I will ask him if he does not know that after this remarkable display of accuracy of figuring, by which three separate concerns figured each the same amount to a penny, when the Secretary rejected these remarkably accurate bids, thereupon there was a reduction made, amounting on the contracts let to $111,000?

Mr. OLIVER. It may be.

Mr. REED. Indicating that the figures were not quite so close and accurate as they might have been?

Mr. OLIVER. It is very natural that if a man does not get a contract at one price he will try to figure his price down.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Following along the lines the discussion has taken, does not the Senator think that there ought to be real competition in the manufacture of armor plate, the same as in any other supply of the Government?

Mr. OLIVER. In answer to that question, Mr. President, considering the nature of this business, premising the reply by saying that of course I am in favor of competition in all things if possible, I will say that in this business I think it would be better for the Government and better for everybody if the business could be done not on the basis of competition but on the basis of calculation as to cost and profit. Further along I shall go into that subject.

Mr. POMERENE. In each of the large countries of the world they are manufacturing armor plate. Here in this country we have, according to the statement of the Senator, three plants engaged in the manufacture of armor plate. When they come in here with their bids, the same to a penny, it does look to me as if it is almost a farce to call it competition. The sameness of these prices must result either from collusion or from combination of some kind or from sheer accident. With three different companies with a very large investment, with the difference that there must be in the manufacture, somewhat, I can not conceive how they could arrive at the same figure unless there was some sort of an understanding between them. It seems to me, further, that we must either determine that we have been mistaken when we asked for bids for Government supplies, or we have been right. If we are right, we ought to have legitimate competition, or we ought to get away from that proposition and let some one fix the prices, and do away with the mere pretense of asking for bids for this work.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Ohio I will say that there is a great deal of sense and a great deal of force in what he says; but while this armor plate has been ostensibly let upon the basis of bids for years past, it has been really let upon the basis of consultation between the department and the manufacturers.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. And the proposition which I expect to prove, if I have time between now and 4 o'clock, is that the prices charged are reasonable, in opposition to the accusations that have been made that the armor-plate manufacturers are exacting an unreasonable price.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

Mr. OLIVER. I think, Mr. President, I will have to yield to the Senator from Utah. I have a good deal to go through with, and there are three other speeches which are announced after mine.

Mr. SMOOT. In connection with what the Senator from Ohio stated, and also the question asked by the Senator from Missouri, I want to say that it is not at all surprising, when you consider the conditions existing, that the bids were the same; and I say that for this reason——

Mr. REED. Without consultation?

Mr. SMOOT. I will give the Senator the reason. I say it for this reason: There is not one of the plants that can manufacture the amount required for the year 1915. Each company, if it bid, would bid upon the full amount required, and if the company knew it could not make the amount required it necessarily would have to find out from the other companies whether they would furnish the amount they could not make themselves. They necessarily would have to consult their competitors to find out whether they would make it or not. We must remember that the three companies have only one customer, and that being the case, each under the conditions existing, knew what they were going to bid. It is entirely different from a case where there is competition in an article, where the manufacturer has a hundred purchasers, and where the manufacturer could make a hundred times the amount of any one purchase.

Mr. REED and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to be courteous to my brother Senators.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator could not be otherwise.

Mr. OLIVER. I will further say that when I am talking on any subject I rather invite interruptions, because they sometimes serve to stimulate me; but I have already been talking nearly an hour. We must start to vote at 4 o'clock, and, out of deference to the three other Senators who are to speak before 4 o'clock, I think I must go on. I have exhausted only one branch of my subject, and I have already spoken as long as I thought I would have to occupy the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, possibly some other Senators might claim the indulgence of saying a word who have not had an opportunity as yet.

Mr. OLIVER. Now, I will hurry on to the other branches of the subject.

It is charged that these manufacturers have been selling armor plate to other countries at a lower price than they sold to the United States. With one small exception of three sample plates that were sold to Japan in 1912, no armor plate has been sold to any foreign Government, since 1895, at a lower price than was at the same time being charged to the United States Government. In 1894 and 1895 the Bethlehem Steel Co. sold to the Government of Russia 1,339 tons of armor plate at $249 per ton. They were then charging the United States Government $520 a ton for the same armor plate. That is the only instance in which that thing occurred, with the exception of one small case which I will allude to later on.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. Let me finish and then I will yield to the Senator from Kansas. In the Niles report, to which I have before referred, Admiral Niles alludes to this instance in the language which I shall read, and I want to call attention to the absolute vindication that is contained in this report. Admiral Niles says in 1906:

> The board's information indicated that the manufacturers of this country are practically alone in demanding of the home Government no greater or even lesser prices for armor than those charged to foreign purchasers. Very generally abroad home prices rule higher than those to foreign customers. In 1894 the Bethlehem Iron Co. made a contract with the Russian Government for about 1,500 tons of armor at a very greatly less price than was then charged this Government. It was claimed that this contract was taken without regard to cost, for the purpose of gaining a foothold and recognition in the European market. This contention is borne out by the prices made by this company and by the Carnegie Co. in later contracts with the same Government. In every instance the prices under these later contracts have been from $100 to $150 per ton above those at that time charged this Government. In all, some 15,000 tons of armor have been supplied the Russian Government by our manufacturers. No other foreign contracts have as yet been entered into, but with the present slack demand for armor in this country, the entry of our makers into the European field may be again looked for.

Now, there was a sale in 1912 of 25 tons, being only 3 plates, to the Empire of Japan, at about $390 a ton, which was slightly below the price then charged to the United States Government. It was never followed up, it being evident that the Japanese Government thought it a safer thing to manufacture armor in its own country and not be dependent upon a foreign supply.

The hearings developed quite a lot of information with regard to these foreign contracts, but it all goes to fortify and to justify what I have said. I will not stop now to read it in detail, but I want to get a chance to do it as soon as possible.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have here the hearings, and I find the answer of Secretary Daniels on page 151, with which I presume the Senator is familiar. He states there that in 1911 these armor-plate companies sold to Italy at $395 a ton while charging this Government $420 a ton. Does the Senator know anything about that?

Mr. OLIVER. That sale to Italy was reinforced by a bonus of $15,000, which brought the price to a figure slightly over that which was charged to the United States.

Mr. THOMPSON. The statement there of the Secretary is practically correct as to those contracts with foreign countries—three different contracts, one from the Bethlehem Co. to Russia, one to Italy, and one to Japan—is it not?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; but the net price to the Italian Government was higher than the price then charged the United States. I will read Mr. Grace's answer to that. He said:

> In 1911 we sold to Italy a little over 2,000 tons at $438.85 a ton. In October of the same year we sold to Italy 780 tons at $426.50 a ton.

That was in 1911. In 1911 the Bethlehem Steel Co. was selling to the United States Government at $420 per ton, which was a lower price than they received from the Italian Government.

Mr. President, I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD a table showing the prices at which the Bethlehem Steel Co. sold to the various foreign Governments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Foreign armor plate contracts received by Bethlehem Steel Co.

Name of Government.	Date of contract.	Tonnage of armor.	Price per ton.
Russia	Dec. 16-28, 1894	1,115	$249 per ton for nickel steel or harveyized.
Do	May 15, 1895	224	Do.
Do	Nov. 27-Dec. 9, 1895	1,137	£107 per ton—approximately $524.
Italy [1]	July, 1911	2,050	$438.85 per ton.
Do [1]	Oct., 1911	780	$426.50 per ton.
Japan [1]	May, 1912	25	£80 per ton—approximately $390. Comprising 3 plates only, to be tested with a view of securing an order if tests proved satisfactory.

[1] Foreign armor not manufactured under 8-hour law.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator just one other question as a matter of information?

Mr. OLIVER. Surely.

Mr. POMERENE. And I will not then interrupt the Senator further. Can the Senator state to what extent these three companies have been engaged in the manufacture and sale of armor plate to other countries? Several instances have been referred to here, but, so far as I have observed, there has been nothing in the debate indicating to what extent the sales have been carried on.

Mr. OLIVER. I am sorry I can not furnish that information in regard to all the companies, as the statistics in the record refer only to the Bethlehem Steel Co. Those that I have given are of the Bethlehem Steel Co. alone. I have not been able to find the extent to which the other companies sold abroad, but my impression is, and I think I am justified in saying, that it was very meager compared to other business. It was only what manufacturers call a fill-up.

Mr. President, on the question of profit in manufacturing armor plate, it is not so much charged as it has been assumed that these manufacturers in the prices charged to the Government have been making extortionate profits. I have not the figures relating to the Midvale and the Carnegie Steel Cos., but the Bethlehem Steel Co. has submitted to the committee very full statements regarding its business with the Government ever since the beginning of the industry. I find from their statement that the Bethlehem Steel Co. has furnished to the Government in the 29 years in which it has been engaged in this business 95,072 tons of armor plate. They received for this an average of $432.62 a ton, which would give them during the 29 years of their existence as a manufacturer of armor plate an average yearly gross income from their armor plate of $1,418,993.60.

Mr. Grace, the president of that company, has testified here under oath that their investment in the armor-plate plant, not taking depreciation into consideration at all, is $7,100,000. So the average gross yearly revenue from this investment during 29 years would be $1,418,993.60, being a little less than 20 per cent on the actual investment in the plant, to say nothing of the working capital that it would take to run it.

Now, remember that this 20 per cent is gross receipts. Out of it must be paid whatever is paid for raw material, labor, supplies, interest, taxes, administration expenses, and everything that goes into the manufacture of armor plate, and whatever little is left may be called profit. It is absolutely impossible that with an investment of $7,100,000 a gross revenue of $1,418,993.60 is going to yield anything more than a reasonable profit, and I do not believe that it will yield any profit at all.

Mr. WORKS. If the Senator will pardon another interruption, is there anything to show what their operating expenses were? That should be taken out of this 20 per cent.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, for instance——

Mr. WORKS. I mean the amount and not the particulars, so that we may determine what was the actual profit.

Mr. OLIVER. You can not determine it. I am only endeavoring to demonstrate, and it will be very plain to one who has had experience in manufacturing operations that with a total gross revenue of 20 per cent on the investment you can not make any money.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator will have to remember that he is talking to people who have not been in the manufacturing business.

Mr. OLIVER. I understand that, but suppose a man would come to the Senator, or to any other man with business sense, and lay a prospectus before him asking him to invest—I will say $7,000 instead of $7,000,000—and would say: "Here, I want you to put $7,000 into this business." "What will the business amount to?" the Senator might ask. "We will do a business of $1,400 a year." I think that would be enough, and would make the proposition ridiculous.

The question may be asked, "Must they not then have been losing money?" I do not say they have been, because, while during some years this plant lay idle, during other years they secured enough business to run it pretty full. During those years I have no doubt they made some money.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OLIVER. I will yield first to the Senator from California, who is still on his feet.

Mr. WORKS. I hope the Senator will not think that my question was ridiculous.

Mr. OLIVER. Not at all. The Senator's question was very apt.

Mr. WORKS. I think the Senator is doing very well with what he is trying to demonstrate, but it seems to me if we can have the whole amount of money that has been expended by these people in operating and in carrying on the plant it would help me at least to decide whether they are making a profit or not.

Mr. OLIVER. There is a great deal of information of that kind contained in these hearings, and some of it I will allude to as I go along.

Mr. REED and Mr. OVERMAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator has stated the gross income of the Midvale Co.——

Mr. OLIVER. The Bethlehem Co.

Mr. REED. The Bethlehem Co. What company is it down there that has just declared 112 per cent dividend for three months?

Mr. OLIVER. I have not heard that any company has declared a dividend of 112 per cent. I believe the Bethlehem Co.'s last report did show a large profit on their war business.

Mr. REED. That is the point.

Mr. PENROSE. That was not on armor plate, but on war orders.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator from Missouri knows very well that it was not on armor plate, and so does everyone.

Mr. REED. I thought possibly if they were doing so well one need not grow tearful over their hard situation.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator yield to me for just one minute for something that will not interfere with him?

Mr. OLIVER. I can not yield for other matters.

Mr. MYERS. I have a right to make this request, Mr. President.

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator has a right to make it he can raise a question of personal privilege, but I can not allow other business to be injected into my remarks at this time, and I will not do it.

Mr. MYERS. I am not going to inject any business into the Senator's remarks. I ask the privilege of stating my business to the Chair.

Mr. PENROSE. I raise the point of order that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor unless the Senator from Montana rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit me the humble privilege of addressing himself for a second to state what I want? I crave that privilege of him.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I must yield to a request like that.

Mr. MYERS. I am now addressing the Senator from Pennsylvania and not the Chair. I will state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that there having been a recess taken yesterday, and this being the same legislative day as yesterday, and knowing that it must be done sooner or later, some time during the day, I would now like to ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business of the Senate, which is the power bill, be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, having the floor with the permission of the Senator from Pennsylvania to make that request I now make the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. It is against the rules, Mr. President, even to do that.

Mr. PENROSE. I object, Mr. President, to any further interruption.

Mr. OLIVER. I myself ask unanimous consent that as of the beginning of to-day's business the armor-plate bill be laid before the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. Is my request first granted, Mr. President?

Mr. OLIVER. I insist on going on, Mr. President.

Mr. Grace, president of the Bethlehem Steel Co., has submitted some figures showing what that company might have made out of the same money invested in other branches of the iron and steel business rather than in armor plate. I ask leave to have his statement printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Comparison of armor-plate business and a standard steel manufacturing business.

The $7,100,000 invested by Bethlehem Steel Co. in its armor-plate plant and appurtenances would be sufficient for the building of a rolling mill with an annual capacity of ——— tons	400,000
During the 29 years the armor-plate plant has been in operation this mill would have produced ——— tons	11,600,000
Where the armor-plate plant produced ——— tons	95,072
The product of the mill would sell at about $35 per ton, on which a moderate profit would be 10 per cent, or $3.50, per ton.
The mill would, therefore, earn per year ———	$1,400,000.00
The average total selling price of armor produced in a year was only 3,280 tons, at $432.62 ———	1,418,993.60

So the armor plate would have had to cost absolutely nothing to manufacture to produce the same profit as an equivalent investment in an ordinary rolling mill.

Mr. GRACE. The first exhibit (see Exhibit "A," p. 7) we place before you is a record of the armor-plate business which the Bethlehem Steel Co. has enjoyed from the United States Government, showing the year, the price, and the amount of tonnage contracted for.

You will note that for a period of 29 years, from 1887 to 1915, inclusive, our company has manufactured 95,000 tons of armor plate, or an average of 3,280 tons per year. During that period we have enjoyed prices ranging from $346 a ton to $520 a ton. The average deducted from these figures gives us an average selling price of $432 a ton. To-day's selling price is $425 a ton.

Mr. OLIVER. I now ask to have inserted in the RECORD the report of the Tillman Board as to the cost of the proposed armor plant, showing that an armor plant with a productive capacity of 10,000 tons per annum could be built for $6,635,107, and that an armor plant with a capacity of 20,000 tons per annum could be built for $10,331,906.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report referred to is as follows:

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, so far as the cost of the proposed Government armor plant is concerned, and assuming that the figures were correct at the time they were made, I am willing just now to essay the rôle of a prophet, and I ask some of my friends in the Senate who will be here at the time of the completion of this proposed plant—if it is ever completed—to call my prophecy to the attention of the Senate in my absence. A plant for producing 10,000 tons of armor plate per annum could not now be built for the amount stated in the Tillman board report, and a plant producing 20,000 tons will never be completed at an expense of less than $20,000,000.

Mr. President, that report was drawn up more than a year ago. I want to give you a few concrete facts as showing the difference between conditions now and then. About the middle of last July the city of Pittsburgh and the county of Allegheny awarded a contract for the steel for a large new building which they are now constructing, and of which the corner stone was laid last Saturday. The steel for that building was purchased last July at $33.80 a ton—fabricated structural steel.

In December last I had occasion to take bids for a building which I am proposing to erect, and I had to pay $45.60 a ton for the same character of steel. I was in the city of Pittsburgh last week, and I made some inquiries in regard to the matter, and I ascertained that such steel can not now be obtained for $60 a ton. So figures obtained over a year ago with regard to this proposed armor plant are to-day absolutely worthless as showing what it will cost.

It is little less than criminal to propose to the people of the United States to enter upon this enterprise facing an acknowledged expenditure of $11,000,000 and a probable one of double that sum. I say, therefore, that the present time is not propitious—if any time should be—for entering upon an enterprise of this magnitude.

Now, as to the cost of making armor. Mr. President, I ask to insert in the RECORD Exhibit C, which is contained in the report of the hearings, and I will say a few words in explanation.

The Tillman board reported as the cost in an armor-plate plant with a capacity of 20,000 tons per annum, running at full capacity, that the cost of operation, the manufacturing cost, would be $262.79 per ton. Following that up, and taking the figures of the Niles board as to what ought to be estimated as additional charges for a plant that would run only two-thirds of capacity and a plant that would run at one-third of capacity, Admiral Niles estimated that if a plant were to be run at two-thirds of its capacity there should be $26.28 per ton added, and if it were to be run at only one-third capacity there should be $79.60 added. So the total manufacturing cost with the plant running at full capacity would be $262.79; running at one-third of capacity it would be $342.39; and running at two-thirds capacity it would be $289.07.

That is the manufacturing cost alone. To that must be added taxes, insurance, administrative expenses, interest on working capital, and all the other charges that a private operator would have to pay. It is contended the Government would not have to pay these other charges; but, Mr. President, somebody must pay them. If the Government locates its armor plant in the city of Pittsburgh and occupies 20 acres of ground, it immediately takes that 20 acres of ground and places it outside the pale of local taxation, and I, as a property holder in Pittsburgh, must pay my share of the additional taxes which will be imposed on that account; and, of course, every resident, whether a property owner or not, must pay, either directly or indirectly, some part of these additional taxes. It is idle to say that simply because the Government does not insure its buildings insurance should not be added as a part of the cost to the Government. If the Government is not to be charged with administration expenses, for what are they keeping up all the administrative buildings and all the immense machinery of administration which is necessary to carry on this great enterprise, the center of which is in Washington? I ask to have inserted now, Mr. President, the extract from the report to which I have referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXHIBIT C.

COST OF PRODUCING ARMOR PLATE UNDER VARIOUS CONDITIONS.

The production cost of armor with shop operating at full capacity has been determined as follows:

Report of Niles Board, House Document No. 193, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, $244.27 per ton.

Report of Tillman Board, House Document No. 1620, Sixty-third Congress, third session, $262.79 per ton.

(The later report reflects advances in cost of labor and material and is quite consistent with the earlier report considering the differences in the dates at which they were made.)

With plant operating at less than full capacity the Niles Board found that the cost would be increased as follows:

Plant operating at half capacity, cost would be increased 20 per cent.

Plant operating at one-third capacity, cost would be increased 30 per cent.

These reports give merc shop cost and do not contain many items that enter into the actual total cost, such as administrative and general expense, insurance and taxes, interest on plant investment and working capital, etc., and in the following tabulation is shown the effect of the addition of some of these very real and important items. The depreciation of the plant, although a real addition to cost, is not included below, as it is shown that prices actually received by the manufacturers have not been sufficient to allow anything for this purpose.

	Cost per ton with plant provided with sufficient contract tonnage to operate at full capacity (10,000 tons). (This is a condition that has never been maintained.)	Cost per ton with plant provided with only sufficient tonnage to operate at one-third capacity. (This approximately represents actual average conditions that have obtained.)	Cost per ton with plant provided with sufficient tonnage to operate at two-thirds capacity. (This condition might obtain as a result of the proposed 5-year program.)
Production cost, plant operating at full capacity (Tillman report)	$262.79	$262.79	$262.79
Add for plant operating one-third capacity, 30 per cent (Niles report)	.....	79.60	.....
Add for plant operating two-thirds capacity, 10 per cent (taken proportionately from Niles report figures)	.....	.....	26.28
Total production cost	262.79	342.39	289.07
Administrative and general expense ($100,000 per year)	10.00	30.00	15.00
Taxes and insurance ($45,000 per year)	4.50	13.50	6.75
Interest at only 5 per cent on $7,100,000 plant ($355,000 per year)	35.50	106.50	53.25
Interest at only 5 per cent on $500,000 working capital ($25,000 per year)	2.50	7.50	3.75
Total	315.29	499.89	367.82

If the contracts awarded in the future should be in the same average quantities as in the past (namely, 3,280 tons per year, or about one-third our plant capacity) the present price of $425 per ton would provide as follows:

		Per ton.
Contract price		$425.00
Less—
Production cost (column No. 3)	$342.39
Administrative and general (column No. 3)	30.00
Taxes and insurance (column No. 3)	13.50
		385.89
Leaving for interest on investment		39.11

With contracts for 3,280 tons, this would provide only $128,280.80 per year, or less than 1¾ per cent on the investment, without any provision whatever for repayment of the capital invested in the plant when it may have to be abandoned, owing to the building of a Government plant or some radical change in the method of manufacture.

Mr. OLIVER. In the Niles report some very pertinent statements are made with regard to the cost of armor. For instance, I quote the following:

The board again invites attention that the full cost of armor herein estimated includes only such actual charges against armor making as must be considered by any private manufacturer in fixing a selling price that will provide for interest on any bonded indebtedness and a fair profit for the whole money invested.

The board desires also to emphasize the fact that its estimates herein have been made on an assumption of an output about equal to the full capacity of the supposed producing plant—the most economical condition of production.

The costs per ton of armor making in any plant vary markedly with the percentage of its capacity that is produced, increasing rapidly as that percentage is decreased. Many of the charges entering into the cost of armor plate remain practically fixed, whatever the relation of output to capacity.

In the manufacture of so special a product much of the labor employed is specially trained, and this labor must, to a large degree, be kept intact under whatever conditions the plant may be running.

In an armor plant that is an adjunct to other works profitable employment for a certain part of this labor may be found, but provision for only a small percentage can thus be made.

The equipment installed can be employed on other work only to a very limited degree, and in no step of manufacture does the amount of labor employed decrease proportionately with the decrease of output. Only in the preparation of molds, transportation, and machining does even an approximation to such a proportionate decrease occur. In all other steps the labor employed can not be greatly decreased, however the output may be reduced. Nor do the materials consumed, excepting those actually entering the plate, decrease proportionately with the amount of armor made. Neither does a decrease of output proportionately decrease the amount of working capital needed or the allowance for maintenance of plant that must be made.

As an illustration of the uncertainties involved in armor making, and of the effect on the cost of it of a deficiency in the amount demanded, the latest contracts with the Bethlehem and Carnegie Steel companies may be quoted. Prior to 1902, the combined full yearly capacities of these two plants was rather less than 10,000 tons. During that year an urgent but temporary demand for armor delivery made it necessary that both plants be greatly extended, and their combined capacities was then increased to, and now is, something over 20,000 tons.

The total award of armor under the latest contracts with these companies is approximately 3,600 tons, and this represents the entire Government armor work these companies will have in hand during the next calendar year. The expenses of the plants during this year must, in consequence, be distributed over an amount of armor that is no more than a normal two-months' output of these two plants, and its cost to each per ton must therefore be out of all proportion to what it would be were these plants working continuously at full capacity.

Thus, in the discussion of the cost of armor-plate production from a given plant, it is most important that due consideration be given to this question of economy of manufacture, as determined by the percentage of its full capacity that the current demand for armor permits it to produce. This board believes that when a demanded output is but one-half the economical capacity of a plant the cost of production will be increased 20 per cent. Should the demand require but one-third the capacity, the increase in cost will be not far from 30 per cent.

Because of the fluctuation of this factor in the cost of armor making, as well as the great variations in the price of the materials entering therein, no estimate of cost may be considered as accurately representative of future conditions.

There are tabulated below the various estimates of the cost of armor-plate production that have been before the board in its consideration of this subject, together with its own estimates. That a proper comparison of these various estimates may be had each has been modified to show the production and full costs as designated by this board. To arrive at these costs each estimate has been analyzed and all items of labor and material selected therefrom, and in the earlier estimates the costs of these items have been revised to bring them into approximate accord with present-day prices. To the totals of the cost of labor and material in each case there has been added the same percentages of working capital and cost of plant as were used in the board's own estimates. The cost of plant taken in each case is that estimated at the time. The working capitals assumed have been made to accord with that used by the board, giving proper consideration to the variation in assumed outputs.

In comparing these estimates it should be borne in mind that although those of 1896 concern only the less-costly class B, while those of 1906 refer to class A armor, the smaller outputs assumed in the earlier estimates greatly increases the fixed charges per ton that must be added to the material and labor items to obtain the production and full costs.

KOSSUTH NILES,
Captain, U. S. Navy, Senior Member of Board.
WALTER MCLEAN,
Commander, U. S. Navy, Member.
EDWARD SIMPSON,
Lieutenant Commander, U. S. Navy, Member.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Navy Department.

On this question of the cost of making armor I ask to have inserted a colloquy between Mr. PADGETT, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, and Mr. Barba, of the Midvale Steel Co. It is somewhat lengthy, and I will not now take the time of the Senate to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. PADGETT. May I ask you a question? If you could take a contract in 1903 at $398 base price on the basis of 5,000 tons, I will ask you to state if the different companies could not afford to take a contract for 16,000 tons (the Bethlehem Co. has 16,000 tons), at less than $425 per ton at the present time.

Mr. BARBA. Mr. Padgett, the answer to your question is a very simple one. The character of armor manufactured in 1903 in no way compares with the character of armor manufactured now, either in size, weight, or bulk of the individual pieces, the ballistic requirements, the character of projectiles used in testing armor, or even the cost of raw material and wages, both of which have very materially increased in the 10 years that have elapsed in that period, and wages in particular have increased approximately 50 per cent through the necessity of manufacturing armor on the eight-hour law. You know most of our processes in manufacturing require operations both day and night. We therefore have divided our gangs into three shifts of 8 hours each, and we have found it absolutely necessary to pay for 8 hours' work exactly what we formerly paid for 10 hours' work, so that the company gets absolutely no increase of production from most of these processes and is obliged to pay a very much larger sum in wages. At the same time the rate of wages has materially increased during the 10 years that have elapsed. The character of the armor is very different, as your own technical men will affirm. The requirements are more severe. The difficulties of manufacture have been multiplied. I will not say that the percentage of rejections has increased, because I believe that the capacity of the makers to manufacture this newer type of armor has also advanced.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean their skill and knowledge?

Mr. BARBA. Their skill and knowledge have advanced. I think it would be quite an interesting study to look up the relative percentages of failing plates in 1903 and 1913. Possibly Mr. Bloch knows offhand what this amounts to. I must say I do not, but I am going to look it up through plain interest in the subject. So that, with the advancing requirements for the production of armor and the increasing difficulties, I believe that the price of armor to-day is too low as compared with the present-day cost of manufacture. As an illustration of that I do not mind telling you, Senator, this much from our books. We should really consider the manufacture of modern armor as represented only by the Pennsylvania armor or the Arizona armor because the specifications took a wide advance about that time. The cost of producing the Arizona armor is approximately $20 per ton more than the cost of producing the Pennsylvania armor at this plant. [Further answer to question:] For the Mississippi and Idaho, which was our initial contract, there were 11 ballistic tests and no failures. These being the first groups of armor ever submitted by this company. In the most recently completed contracts, namely, the Arizona and Pennsylvania, there were four groups of armor, each requiring ordinarily four test plates for the acceptance of the four groups; to pass these four groups it was necessary to present eight plates, four of which failed on ballistic test, requiring substitution or further test plates to the number of an additional four plates, with the consequent loss to the manufacturer. Thus, the increased severity of specifications and difficulty of meeting them resulted in reducing the effective price per ton received by us by the amount of $33 per ton on the contracts of 5,737 tons—$190,000 for the Arizona and Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I had expected to go into some detail on the question of the agreement of manufacturers as to the price, but that subject has been pretty well ventilated in the colloquies which have taken place between my fellow Senators and myself, and I will leave that question for the present. I ask, however, to insert as a part of my remarks a statement of Mr. Barba giving a history of the different bids which were made from the time the Midvale Steel Co. entered the business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

THE ARMOR CONTRACTS OF THE MIDVALE STEEL CO. AND DATA RELATING TO ARMOR.

The Midvale Steel Co., of Philadelphia, made its initial bid for an armor contract on August 10, 1900. (See Appendix A for data regarding company.) (Note by committee: The committee is informed that on this date the Midvale Co. had no armor plant.)

The United States Navy Department opened on that date bids for about 36,000 tons of armor. Midvale bid, net (no royalties demanded), $438 per ton; the Carnegie and Bethlehem Steel companies bid, net (including royalties), $490 for class "A" armor. Midvale received no award. (See Appendix B for details.)

In October, 1903, Midvale was a second time the lowest bidder ($398 per ton, net, was bid on class A, as against $453.60, net, by Carnegie and Bethlehem) on about 16,000 tons of armor. Midvale received a little over one-third of the order. (See Appendix C for details.)

In January, 1905, Midvale was a third time the lowest, bidding $398 net for class A, against the Carnegie and Bethlehem bids of $453.60, net. A contingent order for 1,000 tons out of 8,000 tons was all Midvale received. (See Appendix D.)

In July, 1906, Midvale was a fourth time the lowest bidder, and received 3,660 tons out of 7,319 tons. Midvale bid for class A armor $346, and Carnegie and Bethlehem $381 per ton. (See Appendix E.)

In the summer of 1907 Midvale was a fifth time the lowest, bidding $410 per ton, as against the Carnegie and Bethlehem bids of $420 for class A armor. (See Appendix F, containing important Government letter and details.)

To restrain the Midvale Co. from proceeding with its manufacture of armor, in 1907 three suits were brought against it in the name of Fred. Krupp, Aktien-Gesellschaft. Although these suits were bitterly fought, they were lost in every court; the Supreme Court of the United States also deciding in favor of the Midvale Steel Co. (See Appendix G.)

On November 9, 1908, Midvale was a sixth time the lowest bidder on the total amount of armor of all classes for the Utah and Florida. Midvale was awarded one-third of the tonnage required. (See Appendix H.)

On August 18, 1909, bids for the armor for the Arkansas and Wyoming were opened. Midvale was slightly lower on the total of all classes. (See Appendix I.)

On October 7, 1910, the armor makers were invited to a conference by the Government on account of the increasing difficulties and expense in the manufacture of armor. (Appendix J.)

On December 1, 1910, the bids for the armor for the Texas and New York were opened. Each manufacturer received practically one-third of the order for the Texas armor. (See Appendix K.)

On November 16, 1911, the Government invited the armor makers to a conference in reference to the armor for the Oklahoma and Nevada.

On January 4, 1912, bids were opened for the Oklahoma and Nevada armor. The amount was divided into thirds as nearly as possible. (See Appendix L.)

On December 18, 1912, the Government invited the armor makers to a conference in reference to the armor for the Pennsylvania.

Bids for the Pennsylvania armor were opened February 18, 1913. Midvale made the best bid on every class of armor and received one-third of the total. (See Appendix M.)

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, on the question of the time which will be consumed in the construction of the proposed armor plant I am willing to say from my experience and observation of such matters that if the Government ever gets a plant like this into successful operation it will take a period of very little less than five years. It will not only be impossible in the present congested condition of our industries to have the work hurried to any great extent but, in addition to that, excessive prices will have to be paid for materials and labor. It must also be remembered, Mr. President, that at the beginning of operations in any new plant there is always a period of trial—and a very sore trial it is to those having charge of such operations, as I can testify from actual experience. When the Government first begins to make armor plate at the proposed Government plant it will be found that most of the product, or much of it, will have to be scrapped, and they will have all sorts of trouble. I gave them a year to get over that, and a year is really a very short time, in my opinion.

I wish to read now a part of the hearings with regard to this point. On page 138 of the hearings the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] asked Admiral Strauss this question:

Senator CHILTON. Have you made any estimate or investigation to enlighten the committee as to how soon with this expenditure we could begin the production of armor?

Admiral STRAUSS. We estimated we would have the plant completed in three years from the time that we were authorized to construct it. That estimate was made about a year ago, and undoubtedly now the time would have to be increased and the cost would have to be increased if the present prices and demand for all these materials remains as at present.

Subsequently the chairman, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] said:

The CHAIRMAN. Along that line I want to say, for the information Docks, a man recently appointed, Mr. Harris, who is considered one of the most accomplished civil engineers in the Navy, has, at my request, made a reconnoissance, as much as they would allow him to make, both at Bethlehem and at Midvale, and his report to me, through the Secretary of the Navy, is that if the red tape in the Navy Department is cut and he is authorized to construct this armor factory he believes he can complete it in a year and a half, depending, of course, on the possibility of getting the machinery. [Laughter.]

Now, I leave the question of time as a matter for controversy between Admiral Strauss, with the experience he has had, and this Mr. Harris, whom I do not know.

With regard to the success of the United States in running an armor-plate plant, in the Senate hearings Senator PENROSE asked this question:

Senator PENROSE. Mr. Grace, if the Government went into this business, and the private concerns abandoned the work, is it likely that the Government could obtain the trained people, like yourself, who have started from the earliest beginning in armors, and would there be any assurance that the art would develop like it does in private hands? Do you think it would develop in the hands of the Government?

Mr. GRACE. It is my thorough belief that any process in the hands of one person does not get the competitive features essential to the development of the quality of that process that does exist when it is in the hands of more than one party.

Here I will say, Mr. President, that, while the Secretary of the Navy appears to rely upon competition in prices as the great factor that should be considered by the Government, there is the point of competition in manufacture, which, to my mind, is even more important than competition in prices; because where one man or one combination of men have entire control of any branch of manufacture there will not be the amount of research work, there will not be the close attention to detail, there will not be the careful consideration of new methods that there will be if one manufacturer knows that he has to keep pace with his competitor in another city, who is daily making use of all the scientific information of the age in the development of his business.

I resume:

Senator PENROSE. But could the Government get the trained ironmasters—metallurgists—to participate in this work for the salaries the Government pays?

Mr. GRACE. I should not imagine so, judging from the salaries paid throughout the service, if that is what you mean?

Then Mr. Grace further says:

Mr. GRACE. I can not imagine that they have in their organization to-day sufficiently trained steel metallurgical experts to make armor, and, bear in mind, that every armor-plate plant in existence in this country is combined with a large steel manufacturing plant, which brings that armor-plate industry immediately in possession of all knowledge—metallurgical knowledge and otherwise—in the art of making all grades of steel.

* * * * * * *

And it occurred to me along the line that if this industry was controlled absolutely by the United States Government you would have the purchaser inspecting its own products and accepting it for use. I can not quite conceive that they would be as rigid with themselves in making condemnations as they are with the private manufacturer.

I think if you will refer and ascertain about some other processes and the manufacture of some other commodities for the Government you will find that it has transpired where specifications have been practically ignored.

* * * * * * *

Senator SWANSON. I would like to ask you another question, Mr. Grace, if it will not embarrass you: Do you think, from your experience with the men in the Navy who are supervising this work, that they are sufficiently equipped to run an armor-plate factory?

Mr. GRACE. Not by any means; I certainly do not.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Grace, if the Government should unfortunately, from your point of view, decide that it will go into the manufacture of its own armor and establish a plant, do you think it might be possible that the Steel Trust has already acquired and tied up all the raw material—I mean the ore, and everything else, such as limestone; what do you say as to that?

Mr. GRACE. I believe the Government would be able to obtain the necessary raw materials to make armor with.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is on record as saying that he knows more about the armor-plate business than any man in the Senate, or, I believe, he said any man on the committee. If he knows that, he certainly knows that this armor-plate factory as projected has nothing whatever to do with ore, has nothing whatever to do with limestone. The ore and the limestone are used in the manufacture of pig iron. The first step in the manufacturing of armor plate is the melting of pig iron into open-hearth steel, and the open-hearth furnace is therefore the first step; and the raw material which the Government would have to purchase would be pig iron, which is manufactured by so many concerns, controlled by no trust, that the market is open to all the world. I am rather astonished that the Senator from South Carolina did not manifest as wide a scope of information in that respect as he seems to think he is possessed of.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. PENROSE. Perhaps my colleague is a little hard on the Senator from South Carolina, because he doubtless contemplates having the Government go into the manufacture of pig iron in the course of time.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Pennsylvania knows that I know nothing about the manufacture of armor plate except what I have seen. I have been to the armor factories two or three times. When I went to the Bethlehem plant I noticed that they were making their own pig iron, then taking the pig and carrying it to another furnace and mixing it with nickel and chromium and all that—chromium was not then used, but it has since been used—to make ingots, and those ingots were then carried to a large furnace and heated, and all that sort of thing. I do not claim to be an expert in the manufacture of armor. I thought limestone was necessary as a flux; that is all.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I perhaps should not have made the remark that I did about the Senator; but the reason why I referred to it was because the table which is submitted by the committee of which the Senator is chairman, and which I have had printed as a part of my remarks, in estimating the cost of the proposed plant begins with the open-hearth furnace, and says nothing whatever about the manufacture of pig iron.

Mr. TILLMAN. But pig you have to have.

Mr. OLIVER. Pig you must have; but I will say to the Senator that if he proposes to make pig iron he will have to double this $11,000,000, because he will have to put up blast furnaces, which will involve an expenditure, I will say, of at least three or four million dollars more.

Mr. TILLMAN. We do not propose to manufacture pig iron.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator's own table mentions nothing whatever about manufacturing pig iron. It commences with the manufacture of open-hearth steel.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Do these armor-plate manufacturing plants control their own sources of iron ore or coal or raw material?

Mr. OLIVER. Of course, as everybody understands, the Carnegie Steel Co., which is a part of the United States Steel Corporation, has its own sources of supply in everything. The Bethlehem Steel Co. is largely in the same position, except, I think, that it purchases its coal. I am not sufficiently familiar with the Midvale Steel Co. to know, but all of these different companies manufacture their own pig iron. I should say, however, that I know from the table submitted that it is not contemplated by the board that this new enterprise of the Government shall extend back as far as pig iron. It is to begin with the melting of pig iron and the manufacture of open-hearth steel.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator know whether this bill, which appropriates $11,000,000, I believe——

Mr. OLIVER. Eleven million dollars, to begin on.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does that contemplate the completed plant or is that simply the first installment of the cost of it?

Mr. OLIVER. It contemplates the completed plant, because the figures which I have submitted show that they expect to complete the plant for $10,331,906. I will say, in the nature of a prophecy, that they will never complete a 20,000-ton plant for less than $20,000,000.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The reason why I asked the question was because I had heard somewhere—I did not know whether there was any truth to it or not—that an armor-plate plant to produce 20,000 tons of armor plate per annum could not possibly be built for anything like $11,000,000; that it would cost more than double that.

Mr. OLIVER. It would be only a starter.

Further along in the hearings—and I shall not occupy very much more time—Mr. Barba, vice president of the Midvale Steel Co., says:

To show how much waste there is in this plate, this parallelogram in this photograph (see Exhibit J) represents the plate with which we start, and the inscribed line represents the plate that we ship, being only about 55 per cent of the plate that we present. The rest of it, even after all the prescribed scrap discards are made, the sinkhead 30 per cent, etc., must be sent back to the furnace and remelted. And to-day, after having melted no armor since September 28, we have practically 11,000 tons of this scrap piled up in our works, with which we can do nothing except wait for another armor contract, or sell it in the form of bar steel to the automobile trade, with which we really do have a large business. We are melting up this scrap as fast as we can and sending it out into the country as remade steel, using it in the place of new raw materials.

That, I submit, is a feature of the business which the Government is not in a position to undertake. They can not go into the bar-steel business after they have acquired this accumulation of scrap as a residuum from the material they manufacture.

Admiral Strauss's report last year showed that the average shipment of finished plate to the shipping points is from 30 to 33 per cent of the ingot weight that is produced. The other 66 per cent must be remelted and used in other forms.

* * * * * * *

Then, at the hearings before the investigating committee which reported to the Sixty-third Congress, the following colloquy occurred:

Admiral STRAUSS. Why is it that the French have failed to manufacture armor in their own shop? Why could not they succeed in manufacturing armor if they choose to do so?

Mr. BARBA. You can not get, either in France, whose political system rather nearly approaches ours, or in this country, can you get a staff or personnel to enter into the manufacture of a business like this and succeed with it under conditions such as this Government imposes upon its employees. You take the staff of the Midvale Steel Co., the men who are in charge of it and have been managing the affairs of the company; they started here as boys and have grown up with a sure tenure of office, depending upon good behavior and efficiency and ability and straight living; and we have all succeeded in drawing larger salaries than the Government pays almost any of its employees.

Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a newspaper report of a part of the annual report of the president of the Bethlehem Steel Co., made to its stockholders at the annual meeting on Saturday last, in which he refers to this controversy and states what that company is willing to do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The armor-plate proposition to the Government is announced by Messrs. Schwab and Grace in the following:

"Bethlehem Steel Co. has practically completed deliveries to the Government on all pending armor contracts. Contracts for the current year have not been awarded.

"Your attention is called to the fact that a bill is pending in Congress, and has, with the support of the Secretary of the Navy, been recommended for passage by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, providing for the building by the Government, at an expense of $11,000,000, of an armor-plate plant, with a capacity of 20,000 tons a year.

"This capacity provides for more than double what have been the average actual requirements of the United States for armor over the past 20 years, and if such a bill is passed the value of existing armor plants in this country will be virtually destroyed. Bethlehem Steel Co. has more than $7,000,000 now invested in its plant, devoted to this use, and useless for any other purpose.

"OFFER TO GOVERNMENT.

"Your officers have appeared before the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs and urged the defeat of the pending measure. As it is frankly declared that the sole purpose of the proposed enterprise is that the Government may secure its armor at a lower price, your officers have submitted the following proposition to the Federal Government:

"We will agree to permit any well-known firm of chartered public accountants to inventory our plant and make careful estimates of the cost of manufacture. With that data in hand we will meet with the Secretary of the Navy and agree to manufacture armor at a price which will be entirely satisfactory to the Secretary of the Navy as being quite as low as the price at which the Government could possibly manufacture armor on its own account, after taking into account all proper charges. As a concrete working basis for such negotiations Bethlehem Steel Co. has offered to manufacture one-third of the armor plate required for the contemplated five-year naval program (estimated at approximately 120,000 tons) for a price of $395 per ton for side armor, as compared with the price of $425 per ton now obtaining.

"LOWER PRICES THAN EUROPE.

"It may be added that while all other steel prices have greatly increased the foregoing figure at which we now offer to make armor for the United States is not only a lower price than has been paid by the Government for more than 10 years, but it is also a substantially lower price than is paid for armor by Japan, Austria, Germany, France, or England.

"Altogether aside from the financial interests of your corporation, we, as citizens, and in the light of our experience, should regard it as extremely unfortunate if the United States should enter upon a policy which should prevent there being placed continuously at its disposal in this important detail of national defense the experience, the enterprise, and the initiative of the steel manufacturing industry of the country.

"Assuming that manufacturers are willing to accept as low a price as the Government may properly exact, we earnestly hope that Congress will not feel it necessary to embark upon the proposed policy."

Mr. OLIVER. In the Senate hearings (page 171) Mr. Grace made a very appropriate statement, which I am perfectly willing to adopt as my own. He said:

It would seem to me that this country could not afford to ignore the policy pursued by countries with much larger navies than our own, and consequently much more experience than we have had in creating same. In every instance we see it the policy of such countries as England, France, Germany, Austria, Italy, etc., to encourage the investment of private capital, not only in armor-plate plants, but in plants for the constructing and manufacturing of all classes of war materials. It has apparently been the policy of these countries to recognize such investments as important to their naval and military upbuilding to the end of self-protection. The proposed legislation which you are considering is to the end of destroying the strongest asset this Government can have in the event of its having to battle for its existence.

Mr. President, in the past we have discouraged private manufacturers by hostile investigations, recriminations, and suspicions, whose baselessness could be proved beyond doubt if our disposition were to treat these interests fairly. Of all the naval powers in the world Japan alone has attempted a Government armor plant. The query is: "Why has she done so?" The answer is so simple that even the Secretary of the Navy can understand it; and to the Senator from South Carolina, with his knowledge of all branches of the armor-plate business, it must be as plain as daylight. Private capital refused to invest in armor plants because of the uncertain character of Government business. Japan aspires to one of the greatest navies afloat; and enormous sums, out of all proportion to any reasonable return upon investment, would have been required to build the plant she needed. Exactly the same reasons that have impelled the American manufacturers to confess they must go out of the armor-plate business if the Government goes in have actuated Japanese capitalists in declining to look upon armor-plate making as an attractive business proposition. As a result of this the Japanese Government was compelled perforce to build its own plant; and now, with the only Government-owned plant in the world, it is paying $65 a ton more than the United States is paying for armor plate and $95 a ton above the figure at which the American manufacturers have offered to supply the building program laid down by the Secretary of the Navy. Germany to-day, with her world-famed Krupp Works, is paying for side armor exactly the same price that it costs Japan in its Government-owned plant. I doubt if the Senate or the country realizes that these American manufacturers will sell to the United States Government $95 a ton cheaper than the Krupps sell to Germany. This fact is of great significance if the Senate is disposed to be fair. Mr. President, I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD a table showing the prices for armor prevailing in certain foreign countries. It is compiled from the Navy Year Book for 1915, the last issue, which is entitled "Navy Year Book," containing statistics relating to the American and foreign navies, "Compiled by B. R. Tillman, Jr."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXHIBIT B.

[1]Same as in last Yearbook; no new information.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, when it is considered that never before has the steel business been so prosperous as it is now, and even for ordnance, which Europe is ordering here in staggering quantities and regardless of cost, the prices to the United States Government have not been raised, but on the contrary, show a downward tendency, a ludicrous aspect is given to the proposal of the Secretary of the Navy that the United States shall plunge into an experiment of huge cost and extreme doubt in an ill-considered attempt to depress prices, when the official record shows that the United States Government has been treated more liberally by the American steel men than any other in the world.

What is the real object of this bill? We have the testimony of Admiral Strauss, the star expert of the Tillman special committee, that it is to reduce the prices the Government is paying for armor. The declarations of Admiral Strauss upon this point are so important that I prefer to repeat them in his own words. The admiral already had informed the committee that he regarded the existence of munition plants in actual operation in this country as "a valuable asset," and that he conceded the military advantages of having several plants in the event that one should be captured or injured. But this distinguished officer, upon whose opinion the majority of the committee have based their armor-plate scheme, was compelled to admit that notwithstanding the desire of the Navy Department to reduce the profits of the steel makers, he did not know what a fair profit for making armor is. "I can not estimate—I do not know what a fair profit in this manufacture is"; these are the exact words of Admiral Strauss.

Let me ask you this question—

Inquired the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], who is now in the chair—

Would it be on the whole better for the Government to have privately run plants, if they would furnish armor at a fair profit?

Admiral STRAUSS. If the private firms will furnish armor at a fair profit and will continue to do so under all conditions I see no especial advantage to the Government in going into the business. It all depends on what a fair profit is.

In this connection I will say that I think I have demonstrated that the armor-plate manufacturers not only have been furnishing, but are willing to continue to furnish armor plate to the Government at a fair profit.

Further, I want to call your attention to this most important fact in connection with what Admiral Strauss said. The tenor of his report seems favorable to the construction of this plant, but no officer of the Navy—I want to call the attention of Senators to this statement—no officer of the Navy during the entire 29 years in which the Government has been buying armor plate has ever recommended that the Government go into the armor-plate business, and this statement includes Admiral Strauss as well as all others. Not a single representation or recommendation from a naval officer is upon the record showing that it would be wise, and Admiral Strauss, notwithstanding his report, says that if the Government can obtain armor at a fair profit it is much better to leave it with private industry and private incentive.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the other hand, Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if there are not numerous instances of naval officers who have carefully investigated this subject and advised against an armor-plate factory?

Mr. OLIVER. The trend of all the reports that have been signed by naval officers is against such an enterprise as this.

For many years past the press of the country has been picturing the steel magnates as selling to the Government at outrageous prices and concealing the figures of cost, and since the advent of the present administration these charges have been so constantly reiterated that the public, unaware of the slight basis of fact on which they are founded, have pretty generally come to believe them. Is the Secretary of the Navy fair enough, is the Senator from South Carolina brave enough, to accept the businesslike challenge of the steel companies upon this grossly misrepresented question of fair profits? These companies proposed to the Committee on Naval Affairs, before a vote was taken in that committee on this bill, not only to the committee but to the Secretary of the Navy, that they would submit their books, all their books containing the records of armor-plate manufacture to any firm of regularly chartered independent accountants that might be engaged. It would be idiotic to ascertain the truth regarding the costs of production and then go on making unreasonable bids for Government business. I feel sure enough to warrant my so stating to the Senate, that if the Navy Department should accept this frank offer, the steel companies would agree to abide by the decision of a responsible board of arbitrators as to what constitutes a fair price for armor plate. Could anything be fairer? Could anything be more intelligent? Could anything be more decisive in relation to this theoretical dream of a Government armor plant?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether the offer to disclose the secrets of armor-plate manufacture was not conditioned upon its being regarded as confidential? I remember seeing some such statement, and it produced an unfavorable impression upon my mind. It seems to me that in matters relating to the Government everything should be published and nothing concealed. I observed in the statement I saw regarding it that the committee seemed to resent the suggestion that this communication should be made to them alone in confidence.

Mr. OLIVER. With all deference to the majority of the committee, for each one of whom I have the highest personal regard, I rather think that the committee was disposed to resent any proposition coming from these armor-plate manufacturers, whether fair or unfair. The armor-plate manufacturers offered to allow a firm of accountants, to be selected by the Secretary of the Navy, to go into their works and dig down through their entire establishments to find out what it would cost; and, taking that information as a basis, they are willing to leave it to a board of arbitration as to what should constitute a reasonable profit, and to accept the sum of these two—cost and profit—as the price for the armor. But that a manufacturer should have the records of the inside of his business turned loose in a Senate report for public inspection is a proposition so ridiculous that I do not think it merits discussion.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to say to the Senator from Nevada on the question of not making public all the affairs of these companies, as I understand it they do not object at all to presenting to the Senate the results of their cost; they have done it in this report, but there are secrets of manufacture that they do not want to have made public because they are the property of each individual concern.

I wish to illustrate it by a condition which now exists in connection with shells for the 14-inch guns. The requirements for those shells were considerably increased here in 1913, and an order was placed with those three factories—the Midvale, the Bethlehem, and Carnegie factories. Mr. Grace, representing the Bethlehem factory, testified before the committee that he is under a penalty of $25,000 a month for failure to deliver an order. That order was shells for the 14-inch guns. The Bethlehem has not been able as yet to produce a shell that will conform with the requirements of the order that was placed with them and which they agreed to accept.

I am mistaken as to the order having been placed with the Carnegie Co. It was the Midvale factory and the Crucible people. On the other hand, the Midvale factory and the Crucible people have both been able to make small deliveries on their contract. Now, there is the situation. It has been shown here that there is combination and collusion between these people, and yet the situation at this moment is that one of them is under an enormous penalty of $25,000 a month because they are not able to fulfill their part of the contract, while the other two engaged in it are enabled to make these shells. There are secrets in this business, and I think it is perfectly fair that each one should be able to keep the secrets of their own trade in that way with themselves.

As to the final result of what it costs to make this armor plate, the testimony in the hearing is ample to inform everyone on the subject.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can quite understand——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. OLIVER. If any Senator has any other question to ask me, I will be very glad to answer it before I take my seat; otherwise I yield the floor.

Mr. SWANSON obtained the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to say, with reference to the statement made by the Senator from Rhode Island, I can well understand why an impression should prevail in regard to making public its secret process, because that is really a part of its valuable capital. If it should disclose such a process it might give its rivals an advantage. But as I understood it, the steel companies insist upon it that the information they would give as to cost should be regarded as confidential between them and the committee.

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly they do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not see how the committee could accept a confidence of that kind.

Mr. OLIVER. I have no doubt that they will continue to do so; but they are willing to submit that information to the Secretary of the Navy and let him, in conjunction with a board of arbitrators, after ascertaining the correctness of the figures, find out what is a fair profit, and they are willing to make the armor plate at the sum of those figures.

Mr. NEWLANDS. An inquiry regarding the cost does not necessarily involve a disclosure as to the processes. They are quite distinct.

Mr. OLIVER. To a certain extent it must, but the Senator and I evidently disagree as to the propriety of keeping those things secret. I see no reason in the world why the Secretary of the Navy should not receive this information and treat it as confidential. If the Senator thinks otherwise, it marks a wide difference between him and me. I may be right and he may be right, but I think I am right.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. I did not exactly catch the significance of the Senator's criticism of the Senate committee regarding the demand of the manufacturers of this product to keep certain information secret. That appears in part on pages 114 and 115 and the following pages of the hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs. I wish to ask the Senator this question: Does he not think that the position of the committee was a correct one, to wit, that the committee has no power to make a secret agreement with a witness that it should have information as a committee, which it could not report to the Senate? Does not the Senator think that is a proper position? Under what law or authority could we have a right to accept private information and keep it to ourselves?

Mr. OLIVER. That is plausible, but I think the Senator is carrying it to too great an extreme. However, I referred more particularly to the Secretary of the Navy. I do not see why he should not receive information as he does every day on any subject that comes before him in the administration of his office, and treat it as confidential. While, as I said, the argument in regard to the committee receiving this is plausible, still it is not unknown with the Committee on Foreign Relations. They receive information at almost every meeting which the committee does not disclose even to other Members of the Senate. I do not see why the Committee on Naval Affairs, in executive session, should not do the same thing if they see fit. However, there is no doubt that the Government now has the opportunity, if it wants to do so, to investigate to the limit the operations of these companies and see what it costs them to make armor plate, which will at all events settle the mooted question as to whether they are overcharging the Government or not.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator is a business man of wide experience and great success. What would he say to the proposition if he had an agent representing him somewhere involving negotiations concerning his affairs, and it was proposed by the other party to give that agent information but the agent was not to communicate it to his principal? That is the position the committee was placed in, negotiating for the public and offered information provided we would keep it to ourselves and not communicate it to our principal. I may be absolutely wrong in this, but I can not see how an agent could accept information under those circumstances.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the Senator having done me the honor to rather embellish my accomplishments as a business man——

Mr. CLAPP. Not at all.

Mr. OLIVER. I will answer his question with the utmost frankness. If I had confidence in that agent I would tell him to let no grass grow under his feet, but to get that information just as fast as he possibly could—not to disclose it to me, but to use it for my advantage. A business man would be crazy who would not take advantage of such an offer.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not believe many business men would submit to a proposition that their agent could receive information affecting the principal's business and not be at liberty to communicate it to the principal. I may be mistaken——

Mr. LIPPITT. Such cases arise over and over again in connection with business. A salesman of a concern in intercourse with the customers is told many things in confidence, and if he is an honorable man he keeps them in confidence, but he uses the knowledge to such an extent as he is at liberty to do in connection with the affairs that he represents. That situation is not at all uncommon. In this particular case, the Senator from Pennsylvania has very properly referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which receive numerous communications in confidence, and not only that but come in here and almost imply at times that the other Members shall vote as they have been instructed to vote, because they have certain private information.

Mr. CLAPP. The Committee on Foreign Relations——

Mr. OLIVER. In deference to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] I must yield the floor.

Mr. LIPPITT. Not only that, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota, but when Senators here try to get the information it is refused to them.

Mr. CLAPP. Dealing with foreign relations is one thing and dealing with the business of a principal, and this is a business proposition, is another thing. I understand that in the old days when they were working rebates railroad freight agents were allowed to have understandings that the principals for obvious reasons did not care to have communicated to them.

Mr. OLIVER. I will have to insist on yielding the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. I am on the time of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. With all due deference, and I had just about finished, while that is true, I still repeat that I do not believe there are many business men who have that absolute confidence in their agents—their servants—that they would permit them to receive information affecting the principal's business with the understanding that the agent was under an obligation not to communicate it to the principal.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon while the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] was speaking I asked permission to put into the RECORD the facts about the threat of the armor makers to raise their prices $200 per ton if the Government dared to exercise its right to build its own armor factory. He peremptorily refused to allow it to be done, and I told him I would do it later in my own time. Therefore I am doing it now, and ask to have it printed in the RECORD in large type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Manufacturers' Record, Baltimore, Feb. 7, 1916.]

THE ARMOR-PLATE QUESTION AND THE RELATION OF THE GOVERNMENT AND THE ARMOR-PLATE MAKERS.

"The official announcement of the Bethlehem Steel Co., through its Washington representative to the Manufacturers' Record, that this company will, with a view to the amortization of the investment in its armor plant, advance its price for armor plate if the Government builds an armor-plate plant is one of the most unfortunate statements ever issued in this country by any great business organization dealing with the Government.

"It is a statement of fact rather than a threat, but the statement necessarily becomes a threat.

"It is an effort to prevent the National Government from building an armor-plate plant.

"We trust that other armor-plate concerns do not propose to take such a step, but if they do they will be in every respect equally as deserving of criticism.

"The Bethlehem Co. is the only one from which we have an official statement as to its intention.

"From every point of view this action is, we believe, unwise, and shows a lack of judgment which few people in this country would have been willing to charge to the men who have created the great Bethlehem Co.

"In this case they have shown a narrowness of vision and a disregard of public sentiment lamentable in the extreme. They have illustrated in this case how great concerns sometimes, viewing matters only from one standpoint, make blunders in dealing with the public so bad that one wonders at their lack of understanding of public sentiment and appreciation of the value of public good will.

"It is to such blunders as this that much of the hostility in this country to great corporations is due. Such blunders have cost great corporations far more than they can ever understand or realize. Blunders such as this have been responsible for much of the anarchistic and socialistic sentiment which has found expression in legislation, State and National, antagonistic to corporations.

"They are on a par with that fatal blunder made by the Pennsylvania Railroad some years ago, when, because of its fight with the Gould interests, it ruthlessly cut down the poles of the Western Union Telegraph Co. along its lines. The excuse of the Pennsylvania Co. was that it was within its legal rights, but that road and others paid a fearful penalty for its unwise act.

"The armor-plate companies will be within their legal rights if they follow the plan given to the Manufacturers Record by the Washington representative of the Bethlehem Co., but legal rights and sound business sense may sometimes be millions of miles apart, as in this case. We trust that other armor-plate-making concerns will not follow the unwise lead of the Bethlehem Co. If they do, they will be freely entitled to the same criticism which we are now, much to our regret, extending to our good personal friends of the Bethlehem Co. The men at the head of that company are too big, too broad as constructive upbuilders, to have made such a mistake. They should have been wise enough to know that nothing that they could do would create greater hostility to their work than this statement, and that any action such as they propose of advancing the price of armor plate would in itself be regarded as a threat which the Government would be pusillanimous in the extreme if it did not meet by building an armor plant and thus demonstrate that individual corporations, however great, can not and should not be permitted to dominate the National Government.

"The Bethlehem Co. could not have taken any stand whatever which would have more surely aroused a determination on the part of the Government to build an armor-plate plant than this statement as to its proposed increase of prices. It is scarcely conceivable that men at the head of this great organization could have intelligently considered the subject in all of its bearings before they decided on a plan such as this. And the statement which we publish is, we are advised, officially authorized by the company itself.

"This situation developed by this action practically compels the Government to build an armor-plate plant or to exercise its right to commandeer one. It can not permit itself to be browbeaten. It would cease to be worthy of public respect if it did. But in considering the building of a plant it would be worse than folly for the Government to build it in any portion of the country dependent upon foreign or Lake Superior ores, upon which all our armor-plate concerns now rely."

BETHLEHEM STEEL CO. EXPLAINS ITS PURPOSE TO ADVANCE PRICES OF ARMOR PLATE TO GOVERNMENT—AUTHORIZED STATEMENT OF THE WASHINGTON MANAGER OF THE COMPANY TO THE MANUFACTURERS' RECORD.

[Special Correspondence Manufacturers' Record.]

"WASHINGTON, D. C., February 14.

"There is every prospect that the bill of Senator TILLMAN, of South Carolina, to establish a Government armor-plate factory will be passed by the Senate.

"Republican members of the Naval Affairs Committee who voted against the report of the majority of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee admit that there is already a majority of the Senate in favor of the bill.

"While the favorable report of the Senate committee does not indicate a definite site for the proposed armor-plate plant, should the Government build one of its own instead of buying the property of the Midvale Steel Co. just outside Philadelphia, the Tillman bill suggests that a site be selected on Government land.

"This indicates that Senator TILLMAN's attitude is the same now as it was when the congressional committee, composed of Rear Admiral Strauss, Senator TILLMAN, and Representative PADGETT, who is chairman of the House Naval Affairs Committee, made its report a year ago.

"In that report the only reference to a location was the statement that there was adequate ground at the League Island Navy Yard in Philadelphia, and that by utilizing such a site the Government would be able to save the cost of purchasing new land.

"That the Bethlehem Co. really contemplates an increase in its prices to the Government if the Navy Department enters the armor-plate field itself is admitted frankly in a statement by E. R. Leonard, the Washington representative of the Bethlehem Steel Co., in response to a request from the correspondent of the Manufacturers' Record for a definite statement of the company's policy. The admission that prices will be raised was contained in the following paragraph of the formal statement prepared as an answer to the questions of the Manufacturers' Record:

"'It must be remembered that the board of directors are responsible to the stockholders for this great loss, and that it is their duty to do everything in their power to make up as much of this loss as possible before the plant is completely useless.'

"The intimation that prices might be raised during the period when the Government was establishing its own armor plant was previously made in an indirect manner and apparently without a sponsor. The Bethlehem Steel Co., with $7,100,000 invested in its armor-plate manufacturing plant, and the Midvale Steel Co., with its investment of $6,500,000, had made a definite offer of compromise to the Government with the frank purpose of preventing their own destruction. The terms of the offer were substantially as follows:

"'If the Government will agree to permit the existing armor-plate companies of Pennsylvania to manufacture all the armor plate needed for a five-year building program, the manufacturers, in return, will agree to turn out armor, the Bethlehem Co. reducing its price to $395 a ton for side armor and for all other class of armor in the same relation, while the Midvale will lower to $402.50 per ton for the same kind of armor. Assurance must be given by the Government, however, that there will be enough work to keep the existing plants at work for five years if these favorable terms are to be accorded.

"'If, on the other hand, Secretary Daniels insists upon a Government armor-plate factory turning out 20,000 tons annually, in accordance with the terms of the bill introduced in the Senate, and on which the Senate Naval Affairs Committee has been holding hearings, the armor-plate companies will feel it necessary to adopt the ordinary business methods of self-preservation, and while the Government is building its own plant they will charge prices in accordance with the ordinary law of supply and demand.

"'In other words, the armor-plate factories will meet their prospective great loss by a system of amortization, carrying the ultimate loss over a period of years by the simple process of raising their prices while they are still free from Government competition.'

"In making the majority report to the Senate advocating the Government's entry into the armor-plate business, Senator TILLMAN denounced the Carnegie, Bethlehem, and Midvale steel and ordnance companies as a monopoly of the worst type. In the statement issued in conjunction with the report Senator TILLMAN expressed himself in favor of the Government purchasing the property of the Midvale Co., which would give Philadelphia the Government-owned establishment. Senator TILLMAN said:

"'I have no earthly doubt that the Government can run its plant as well as the present makers of armor do theirs. If the Midvale Co., which seems to be under the control of a sensible man, Mr. Barba, will sell its plant at anything like its real value, I should favor the Government buying it and expanding it to the necessary size and supply all the armor we need. Mr. Barba testified that when the company went into the business they did not have any factory, but expected to build one within 26 months. I have no doubt that the Government could build a plant in 18 months.

"'There are only three manufacturers of armor in this country, and the result is either a monopoly or a combine of the worst type. None of the conditions that tend to check monopoly are present. The number of manufacturers is necessarily limited, and the Government is compelled to buy their product, regardless of the price charged, because the law does not allow the Secretary of the Navy to go outside of this country to buy it.

"'The manufacturers have no fear of private competition for there is not sufficient demand for armor to justify the entrance of other parties. It is plain that Congress can pass as many laws as it chooses and give the Secretary of the Navy as much discretion as he may ask without remedying the situation. As long as present conditions continue the armor manufacturers of the United States are in a position to force the Government, in the language of the highwayman, to "stand and deliver."

"'The committee has no desire to criticize unjustly the manufacturers of armor plate. They have done no more than most other men would have done under similar circumstances. It suffices to say that the committee is of the opinion that the Government has been charged unreasonable prices for its armor plate, and that the only remedies are in the Government owning and operating a plant. Should the Government build it and then lock it up and it never be used it would be wise to erect it, as it would serve as a warning to private manufacturers that there is a point beyond which the Government will not be driven and where patience ceases to be a virtue.

"The statement made by the Bethlehem Co. was prepared by E. R. Leonard, Washington representative of the Bethlehem Co. This statement obtained exclusively by the Manufacturers Record, explains authoritatively for the first time the exact position of the Bethlehem Co. with reference to the proposed Government venture. It is as follows:

FRANK AVOWAL OF AN ARMOR-PLATE MAKER.

[By E. R. Leonard, Washington representative, Bethlehem Steel Co.]

"'From previous experience manufacturers know that if the United States Government erects an armor-plate plant of 20,000 tons capacity, this plant will be worked to full capacity, resulting in a complete Government monopoly in the manufacture of armor plate. There are several examples of this, such as the Government cartridge-case plant. No cartridge cases have been manufactured for the United States Navy by private concerns in recent years. Next, the Naval Gun Factory. This plant has been given all the work it has been possible to take, the plant running full three eight-hour shifts, the private plants receiving only what was left over, which has been little or nothing.

"'The most glaring example is the shipbuilding plant at the New York Navy Yard. This plant has been given more work than can be handled. This is readily shown by the report issued by the Bureau of Construction and Repair, dated December 10, 1915. The percentage of completion of the U. S. S. Idaho, being built by the New York Shipbuilding Co., is 40.5 per cent, and the percentage of completion of the U. S. S. California, being built by the New York Navy Yard, is 6.5 per cent. Contracts were awarded to both places at the same time.

"'The Navy Department undoubtedly knows that this situation will occur as soon as the armor-plate plant is completed; in fact, Senator TILLMAN stated during the hearing of the committee appointed to investigate the costs of an armor plant for the United States as follows, his remarks being addressed to Mr. Barba, then manager of the Midvale Steel Co.: "You will realize that if the Government enters into the manufacture of armor itself, it will destroy your business in that respect. That is, you will make no more armor, and it will be very unfortunate for the company as well as ourselves if we (meaning the Government) were to manufacture our own armor, because it would be much better if we should have the manufacturers supply the Government at a reasonable price."

"'The situation simply results in this: That as soon as the Government plant is constructed the Bethlehem Steel Co. will have on its hands a plant of no monetary value whatever. This plant consists in an investment at present valued at $7,100,000, but does not include money expended on improvements, which makes it considerably greater. It is stated that this plant will have no monetary value simply because it is absolutely useless for the manufacture of any other product.

"'The deduction of $7,100,000 from a capitalization of only $30,000,000 is a great question to be considered by the board of directors of this company. It must be remembered that the board of directors are responsible to the stockholders for this great loss, and that it is their duty to do everything in their power to make up as much of this loss as possible before the plant is completely useless.

"'The fact should also be kept in mind that the Bethlehem Steel Co. entered in this business, spending millions of dollars in investment, upon the urgent request of the United States Government. When the Government first desired armor plate it sent advertisements to all concerns throughout the country to bid on it. Only one company in this whole country responded, and that was the Bethlehem Steel Co. If it had not been willing to undertake this hazardous business, our Government would have been forced to purchase armor plate from Europe.'"

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I did not want to interrupt the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] during his address, but if the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] will yield to me for a moment, I would like to insert in the RECORD now, in answer to the argument of the Senator that no armor plate has been sold by the armor-plate companies for a less price than sold to the United States Government, the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, on this point, on page 151 of the hearings, as follows:

Secretary DANIELS. Well, in 1894 there was some international business. The Bethlehem Co. sold armor plate to Russia in 1894 at $249 a ton; at the same time, under the contract of March, 1893, they sold armor plate to the American Government for $616.14 per ton. In 1911 they sold to Italy at $395 a ton, while they were charging this Government $420 a ton. Later they sold it to Japan for $406.35 a ton, as against prices ranging from $540 to $440 a ton to this country.

In answer to the argument that there has been no combination or collusion in the bidding by these armor-plate companies, I wish to insert the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, appearing on page 154 of the hearings, as follows:

Secretary DANIELS. The first contract we offered, in 1913, was the armor plate for the Arizona, I think.

Mr. BARBA. Yes; No. 39.

Secretary DANIELS. When the bids came in from Carnegie, Bethlehem, and Midvale they were identically the same figure, $454 per ton.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean to say that these three competitors all happened to hit on the same price?

Secretary DANIELS. To a cent.

Senator POINDEXTER. What year was that?

Secretary DANIELS. 1913. I rejected all these bids on the ground that there had been no competition. Later I had a talk with the gentlemen representing these three companies and told them that we wished competition, and that I could not understand how they could hit upon identically the same figure to a cent. Their answer was this: The Midvale people said that some years before that, when bids were offered, they had made the lowest bid but were not awarded the contract, and that the department adopted the policy of dividing the contract between the three concerns; and they said, of course, "Why should we bid a lower figure if it is going to be awarded one-third to each of us at the same price?" But I advertised again, and they came down to $440 per ton, enabling the department to effect a saving of $111,000 on that contract.

For these reasons, showing that the prices charged this Government are exorbitant and the result of combination and that these companies have shown a disposition to sell foreign countries armor plate for a less price than this Government, I shall take pleasure in voting for this bill. It seems to be the only practical way for the Government to safely protect itself in this important matter.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MYERS. I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the request?

Mr. HUGHES. To lay aside temporarily the unfinished business.

Mr. PENROSE. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. MYERS. Is my request granted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. SWANSON. I can not yield further. There are several Senators who wish to follow me and have asked me how long I would speak, so that they would be able to speak on this question. I will ask Senators not to interrupt me until I have concluded my remarks, and then I will be very glad to answer every question that any Senator may desire to ask me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the Senator from Virginia proceeds, so that there will be something before the Senate for discussion, the Chair will lay Senate bill 1417 before the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1417.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will treat the motion as a request for unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and lays the bill before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the pending bill proposes that the Government should either erect or purchase, or do both, a plant for the purpose of manufacturing armor plate needed for naval purposes. The bill appropriates $11,000,000 for this purpose, and it is expected that the Government will be able to manufacture not less than 20,000 tons of armor plate annually. It is believed that this will be sufficient to fill the present needs of the Government for armor. If a larger quantity is needed in the future the plant or plants can be sufficiently enlarged to supply the new demand.

The first question to consider in this matter is what will be the savings to the Government by this proposed undertaking. This conclusion can be reached by ascertaining what it will cost the Government to manufacture its own armor, what it would otherwise have to pay outside manufacturers for these purchases, and the amount of armor required by the Government. If the present naval program is adopted, which seems probable, the Government will need for its battleships in the next five years 113,200 tons of armor plate. This is a sufficiently large quantity to justify the Government in taking decisive steps to obtain armor at a fair and reasonable price. For the last 20 years persons in Congress and out of Congress have been satisfied that the Government was paying an exorbitant price for its armor, and that the three manufacturers of armor in this country were making undue and extravagant profits.

Few subjects of legislation have been investigated by Congress as has this one. Committees of the House and Senate and expert boards have repeatedly looked into this matter and reported on the subject. Every available source of information has been exhausted to obtain full and accurate information with regard to this matter, with the exception of the books of these companies, which books have been inaccessible to the Government. These companies have refused to permit their books to be examined unless the information obtained be held as strictly confidential. These companies have refused to state the cost of their armor plate or the amount of profit derived from sales to the Government unless it should be treated as strictly confidential. This has been their policy in every investigation for the last 20 years.

The excuse offered by these companies for not permitting an examination of their books or to furnish any information as to the cost of manufacturing armor or the profits made is that they do not wish to disclose the secrets of their business. Secretary of the Navy Herbert, in a report made by him under direction of Congress, and Admiral Strauss and other experts testifying before committees stated distinctly that there were no secrets in connection with the making of armor plate not known and that none would be disclosed by an examination of the books of these companies. In seeking information from these companies as to the cost of producing armor and their profits, the companies have been repeatedly informed they were not expected to disclose any secrets of manufacture, but that the only information desired was the cost of armor and the profits made by them in its manufacture and sale. This information, which could not involve any secrets of manufacture, has not been given. Vague statements and estimates have been given, based on conditions which it was impossible to ascertain the correctness of.

The conclusion has been reached by many that the difference between the cost of armor plate and the selling price to the Government is very great and exorbitant and that the companies' refusal to give this information is because to do so would be prejudicial to the continuance of the present system of securing armor plate. It is difficult to realize that these companies would refuse to furnish information as to the cost of armor and the profits derived from sales to the Government if they were as small as has been claimed by some. The Government, as their only customer, is entitled to know whether the prices charged are fair and reasonable or not. I am satisfied that if either of these companies had a private customer as large and situated as the Government is they would have promptly furnished full information as desired. Being refused this information by these companies, the Government has proceeded to make a thorough investigation to ascertain, as far as can be, the facts with reference to the manufacture of armor plate and its cost. Time will not permit me to discuss the many examinations and investigations that have been made, and I shall confine my remarks to those which have been the most thorough and by the most experienced experts.

In June, 1896, Congress directed the Secretary of the Navy to examine into the matter of the actual cost of armor plate. Hon. Hilary Herbert, who had formerly been a Member of Congress with long service and experience on the Naval Committee of the House, was Secretary of the Navy, and made the investigation. He had associated with him in this investigation Capt. W. T. Sampson, Chief of Ordnance, and Chief Constructor Philip Hichborn, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair. These two distinguished naval officers, whose patriotism and ability and love of the Navy could not be excelled, were experienced experts on this subject and aided throughout the investigation. The naval officers stationed at the works of the armor-plate manufacturers, also experts, as inspectors, also aided and made full examinations and reports. Investigations were also being made in England and France. Every agency possessed by the Navy Department was used to ascertain what was a just and fair cost of the manufacture of armor plate. The examination and report of the Secretary of the Navy, and the many experts engaged with him, clearly disclose to an impartial mind that their investigation was fair, conscientious, and unprejudiced. Everything indicates a disposition on their part to treat the manufacturers with fairness.

After making an extensive examination of the cost of labor, cost of material, and allowing 10 per cent for the maintenance of the plants, Secretary Herbert reached the conclusion that the cost of a ton of armor plate to the Bethlehem Steel Co., having a fair amount of work at that time, was $248 per ton. He states that this conclusion of $248 as the cost of a ton of armor plate was further strengthened by the fact that the Bethlehem Co. was at that time furnishing the Russian Government armor plate at $249 per ton. It is presumed that this company was not selling armor plate to the Russian Government at less than cost, but probably at about cost. Secretary Herbert, in his report, gives in full the various elements of cost that aggregate the $248. At this time the Bethlehem Co. was furnishing armor plate of various kinds to the United States Government at a base price of $515.40 per ton. This will give us some conception of the immense profits made by this company and explains their unwillingness to furnish the Government with any information at this time with regard to the cost of armor plate and the profits made. The Carnegie Steel Co., at practically the same cost of manufacturing, had a contract and was furnishing armor plate at the same price.

By act of March, 1897, Congress fixed the price of armor plate at a limit not to exceed $300 per ton. The Carnegie and Bethlehem Cos. refused to bid for this armor plate, amounting to more than 8,000 tons, because of the fixed limit of cost. No contracts were made until Congress had increased the limit from $300 to $400 for the armor purchased at that time, and contracts were made with the Carnegie and Bethlehem Cos. at this price. This investigation and action by Congress resulted in great savings of money to the Government and still left a large margin of profit for the companies. This limit of $400 per ton expired.

In 1900 bids were asked for on about 37,000 tons of armor plate. There were three bidders—the Carnegie and Bethlehem Cos., as usual, bidding the same price on one-half each, and the Midvale Co. bidding on all at a greatly reduced price. The Midvale Co. at that time had no plant, but offered to contract and give ample security to erect a plant and deliver the armor bid for at the time specified in the contract, with the exception of 7,000 tons needed within 12 months. The department rejected all of these bids, refusing to consider the bid of the Midvale Co. After negotiating with the Carnegie and Bethlehem Cos., one-half of the armor plate desired was awarded to each of these two companies at $420 per ton, this award at this price giving to these two companies an immense profit. In 1903 bids were asked for on about 17,000 tons of armor plate. The Carnegie and Bethlehem Cos., evidently working in combination, offered to furnish one-half of this armor plate each at the previous price of $420 per ton. The Midvale Co., having constructed a plant, bid to supply this armor plate at $398 per ton, being the lowest bidder by $22 per ton. If the bid of the Midvale Co. had been accepted, the Government would have saved more than $340,000. The Government awarded a little more than one-third of this contract to the Midvale Co. at $398 per ton and awarded the remainder to the Carnegie and Bethlehem Cos. at $420 per ton. It has never been satisfactorily explained why the lowest bid was not accepted for the entire amount. It is still more difficult to explain why more than two-thirds was awarded the Carnegie and Bethlehem Cos. at $22 per ton more than the bid of the Midvale Co.

In 1905 bids were asked for on about 8,000 tons of armor plate. The Carnegie and Bethlehem Cos. again bid for one-half each, at $420 per ton, the Midvale Co. bidding on the entire amount at $398 per ton. Again the awards were made, a small part to the Midvale Co. and the residue to the Carnegie and Bethlehem Cos. at $420 per ton, the Bethlehem Co. getting the larger part. In 1906 bids were asked for on about 8,000 tons of armor plate, and again there were three bidders—the Carnegie, Bethlehem, and Midvale Cos. For the first time the bids of the Carnegie and Bethlehem Cos. differed, the bid of the Carnegie Co. being $370 and the Bethlehem Co. $381 per ton. The bid of the Midvale Co. was $346 per ton. This was the first time there was active competition between the three companies, and there was a great reduction in the price. These contracts were awarded about one-half to the Midvale Co. at $346 per ton and one-fourth each to the Carnegie and Bethlehem Cos. at $346, being the lowest price bid. This time the Navy Department reversed its policy and divided the awards between the different companies, not at their bid price, as heretofore, but at the lowest price bid. The Midvale Co., realizing that if it bid for all the armor plate at the lowest price it would only get a part of it at the price bid, and that there was no genuine competition, ceased making genuine competitive bids.

Until 1913 the bids of the Carnegie, Bethlehem, and Midvale Cos. were the same, and the contracts for armor plate were divided among these three companies at $420 per ton. In 1913, the last award under the Taft administration, the price was increased to $454 per ton and the amount divided among the three companies. All competition has absolutely ceased. The contracts were awarded about equally between the members of this combine. How equally the department divided its awards among the members of this monopoly and how equally they profited at the expense of this unjust combination is shown by the awards made from 1907 to February, 1913.

During these years the Bethlehem Co. received contracts for 23,588 tons, the Carnegie Co. for 23,641 tons, and the Midvale Co. for 21,571 tons. It might be truly stated here that all Gaul was divided in three parts. What is still more remarkable is that, during all of these years, the Government did everything it could to prevent competition between these three companies and to encourage them to enter into a combination and destroy all competition. While pretending to assail monopoly in the courts and the legislative hall, those in control of the Government during these years were exerting their influences to suppress competition and to encourage combination. During all of these years there was only one year when there was competitive bidding among the three companies, and that was in 1906, when the Government, on account of this competition, obtained its armor plate for $346 per ton.

The loss the Government sustained on account of the suppression of competition in the manufacture of armor plate was astounding. The Government purchased 233,400 tons of armor plate at an average of $439 per ton. If it could have obtained this armor at $346 per ton, the price paid in 1906, the one year in which there was competition between the three companies, it would have saved $93 per ton, which aggregates on the amount purchased $21,706,200. This is the amount paid by this Government on account of its officials fostering monopoly in the production of armor plate.

This was the condition existing when Secretary Daniels took charge of the Navy Department. Monopoly by combinations had been installed and sustained completely in this matter. The first bid submitted to Secretary Daniels for armor plate was for the battleship Arizona. The bids of each of the three companies engaged in the manufacture of armor plate were identical to the penny and similar to the bids previously submitted to the outgoing administration. The magic spell which had for 16 years protected them with unerring foresight and the harmonious agreement which distinguished this combination had not been dissipated. Secretary Daniels promptly rejected all of the bids and vigorously protested against the system, and by his earnest and energetic efforts reduced the price of the armor plate for the battleship Arizona and other ships. By refusing to submit to the demands of this combination he has saved the Government on the armor plate purchased by him $1,110,084. This is an indication of what an efficient and vigorous Secretary, looking after the interests of the Government, can save on one item in a very short time.

Realizing that in the purchasing of armor plate the Government was completely at the mercy of this combination, he has recommended to Congress the passage of the pending bill, so that the Government can erect or purchase an armor plant and manufacture at least a part of the armor plate used, and be saved from paying the extravagant and unreasonable prices heretofore bid. He has stated that in purchasing armor plate the Government is completely at the mercy of a long-established and well-organized combination. Having for years enjoyed the benefits and profits derived from combination, he does not think that these three companies can ever again be induced to enter into competition.

The extent to which this country is at the mercy of this combination was strikingly illustrated not many weeks ago. While this bill was pending in the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate we were informed that if this bill should pass and the Government manufacture its own armor, in part or in whole, all armor sold to the Government by these companies would be at a price of $200 per ton in excess of what is now being charged. This was evidently intended as a threat to prevent the passage of this bill. It was recognized that it would be at least two years, if not more, before a plant could be erected. During this period the Government could obtain its armor from no one else except the present manufacturers. If they have the power to extort any price they think proper, and this threat is carried into execution, the armor needed during the next three years for naval program would cost the Government nearly $12,000,000 in excess of the price paid at the present time. This condition gives us some conception of the pitiable condition to which this great country is reduced in preparing for national defense and protection. If these companies are able to enforce this exaction now, they will in the future, unless this bill passes, be able to make any demands their greed and self-interest may dictate.

Our Navy constitutes our chief defense. Upon it depends national honor, national security, and national greatness. The great battleships using armor plate constitute the chief source of naval strength and power. This great Republic is, indeed, in a deplorable condition if the construction of these battleships is dependent on the caprice or self-interest of private concerns. We are now in a situation where the more urgent our needs for armor plate the greater the price exacted by this combination. The Secretary of the Navy is right in demanding that this Government in its most important armament should be unfettered by selfish private interests. The vast interests involved make it dangerous to be dependent upon private enterprises and private control.

Responding to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy, Congress, by act of June 30, 1913, appointed a committee, consisting of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, the chairman on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, and a naval officer to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, to investigate and report at the next session of Congress upon the cost of erecting an armor-plate plant and the cost of manufacturing armor plate, and also the cost of manufacturing armor plate by the Government. The Secretary of the Navy appointed Rear Admiral Joseph Strauss, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, as a member of this committee.

A more efficient and capable committee could not have been selected. The senior Senator from South Carolina, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, has for 20 years devoted his great ability and energy to the study of the manufacture of armor plate. He unquestionably knows more about this subject than any other Member of either branch of Congress. Mr. PADGETT, chairman of the Naval Committee of the House, also a member of this committee, is a man of industry and great ability and has a thorough acquaintance with naval affairs. The House of Representatives has rarely ever possessed a more efficient and capable chairman for its Naval Committee. Rear Admiral Strauss, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department, is acknowledged to be one of the greatest experts on this subject in this or possibly any other country. He is an officer of unusual ability.

This committee made a most thorough investigation, having the assistance of the Government inspectors at the armor plants and other experts. A perusal of the report of this joint committee will disclose that the committee was painstaking, careful, and thorough, and that this report can be relied on as the best source of information obtainable on this subject. This bill carries out the recommendations of this committee.

The Committee reported that an armor-plate plant could be erected to manufacture not less than 20,000 tons of armor a year for the sum of $10,331,906. The report gives in the fullest details what is needed and the estimated costs. A more complete and thorough report could not be made. The very smallest items needed in the manufacture of armor plate are enumerated and estimated for. The services of the best experts were obtained in the making of the plans and estimating the costs. Congress can not obtain better or more complete information on this subject. Although the committee included in their estimate 10 per cent for possible contingencies that might arise, the Naval Committee of the Senate increased the estimate by more than $600,000, making the total amount required $11,000,000, as provided for in the bill, to certainly cover every possible cost.

The Naval Committee believes that a plant with a capacity of at least 20,000 tons per year can be erected for the sum of $11,000,000, and we feel fully justified in reaching this conclusion from the accurate information furnished by this joint committee. A careful perusal of the plans will show they are well conceived and the costs carefully estimated.

This joint committee also made a most thorough investigation as to what it would cost the Government per ton to manufacture armor plate. It goes into detail as to the cost of material, labor, and all the various processes used in the manufacture of armor plate. It enumerates the various items of cost, so that if any omission or mistake was made it could be corrected. In estimating the cost of making armor plate by the Government, it provides for expert officials at fair and reasonable salaries. It provides for getting the plant well equipped and being kept in good repair. It allows for the upkeep of the plant or plants 2 per cent a year on the cost of the plant. The committee estimates that the probable cost of armor plate in a plant of 20,000 tons' capacity operating at full capacity will be as follows:

Labor (per ton)	$71.92
Material (per ton)	107.14
Repairs and maintenance	40.72
Maintenance of plant	10.33
Aggregating per ton	230.11

Thus the committee estimates that the Government can manufacture armor plate in a plant of 20,000 tons' capacity, working at full capacity, at $230.11 per ton. Experts testifying in behalf of the companies engaged in the manufacture of armor plate stated that this was a fair and reasonable estimate of what it would cost the Government to manufacture its own armor plate, except they pointed out some items which they insisted should be included in this estimate of cost. They insisted that interest on the cost of the plant should be included and that the charge for upkeep and depreciation should be greater.

If interest is charged on the plant at 3 per cent, the price at which the Government can sell its bonds, and an additional charge made for upkeep and depreciation, it would not exceed $20 per ton additional. Thus it is practically conceded that the Government, in a plant of 20,000 tons' capacity, working at full capacity, can make its armor plate for at least $250 per ton. If the Government should erect a plant of this capacity and manufacture the 113,200 tons of armor it will need for its contemplated naval program during the next five years, instead of paying, as at present, $425 per ton, it would save $9,810,000, which would almost pay for the plant.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator, at that point, how long the committee estimated it would require to erect the proposed armor plant?

Mr. SWANSON. One engineer estimated it could be done in 18 months, but from 2 to 3 years was about the conclusion the committee reached. They thought that it could be erected in not less than 2 years and would not take over 3 years.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator says one engineer estimated that this plant could be constructed in 18 months. Was not the statement of that engineer, if he was an engineer, qualified by saying it could be constructed in that time if the red tape of the Government could be eliminated?

Mr. SWANSON. That is correct.

Mr. LIPPITT. As a matter of fact, the testimony was that it would require four years?

Mr. SWANSON. That is the testimony, as I understand, of those who do not wish the plant to be erected.

Mr. LIPPITT. Admiral Strauss testified that it would require three years under the conditions that existed a year ago, and now that time would have to be extended.

Mr. SWANSON. Of course, business is so prosperous and such a great wave of prosperity is sweeping all over the country it might be difficult to get the work done, and no strictly accurate estimate perhaps can be made as to the time it would require to construct the plant; but Admiral Strauss is satisfied that in ordinary times, with a normal price for materials, it could be constructed in from two to three years.

Mr. LIPPITT. Admiral Strauss testified that under such conditions it would take three years.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understood the Senator to say that the estimate is that the proposed Government plant will be able to make armor plate at a cost of $230 a ton.

Mr. LIPPITT. Running full.

Mr. SWANSON. Running full capacity.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does that include interest upon the plant and depreciation?

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator had listened to me——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I regret that I have not heard all of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. SWANSON. He would have known that it included interest at 3 per cent and every possible charge that could be made for maintenance and upkeep.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And it provides for depreciation?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

The Naval Committee, believing that the best interests of the country would be promoted by its owning and operating an armor plant, and that this vast sum of money should be saved, reported favorably by a very large majority the pending bill and urged its passage by Congress. Even if the construction of this plant should not result in this great saving to the Government the committee believe it would be better for the Government to manufacture at least a part of the armor needed in its own plant. Those engaged in the manufacture of armor plate stated that if the Government should commence the manufacturing of a part of its armor plate it should provide for the manufacturing of it all, as they would abandon the business as soon as the Government entered it. As the Government could manufacture 20,000 tons cheaper per ton than 10,000 tons it was decided by the committee to report a bill providing for the erection of a plant of 20,000 tons capacity to meet the present needs of the Government.

If the Government can enter into the manufacture of any of its armament, it can certainly enter with more propriety into the manufacture of armor plate than anything else. The Government is the sole purchaser of armor plate. The manufacturers of armor plate have no customers outside of the United States Government and a few foreign Governments. Thus the Government can enter into the manufacture of armor plate without disturbing any individual business except this one branch of the steel business. It simply proceeds to provide in the most economical way for its own needs. It does not contemplate manufacturing anything for sale in competition with anyone.

At present the Government is compelled to keep at each one of these armor plants an inspector to see that the manufacturers comply with the processes of manufacture, that the specifications are fulfilled, and that the armor plate measures up to the proper requirements. It is compelled to do this to prevent inferior armor plate being furnished. Despite the great vigilance inferior armor plate has been furnished to and used by the Government. It is to the interest of the Government that the armor should be as hard as it is possible to make it, and hence the necessity of this vigilance. The harder the armor the greater the cost, and hence it is to the interest of the manufacturers that the armor should go through as few processes as possible in hardening since it greatly reduces the cost. Complaint is frequently made that the requirements of the Government are severe in requiring the utmost hardness in its armor. Thus there is a continual conflict between the manufacturers of armor and the Government.

If the Government manufactures its own armor, this conflict of interest disappears. It becomes the interest of the Government, both as a manufacturer and owner of ships, to produce the best possible armor. This favorable condition can only be obtained by the Government owning its own plant. Besides, if the Government should discover any new processes in the making of armor, while the armor is being made by private concerns, the secret or secrets would have to be given these private concerns. These manufacturers insist they can not disclose to the Government any of their secrets without great detriment, yet they think the Government should give them all of its secrets. The Government should manufacture its own armor and be able to develop new processes and keep them secret and not allow them to be used by other Governments with whom we might at some time be in conflict. Only last year the Government was compelled to institute suit and obtain an injunction to prevent a private concern engaged in the manufacture of torpedoes from using some of its secret processes in making torpedoes for a foreign Government. This clearly discloses the dangers to which we will be subjected in permitting the manufacture of armor plate to be absolutely in the hands of private concerns.

The contention is made that if the Government enters into the manufacture of armor the corporations now engaged in it would cease making it, and the Government would be at a great disadvantage in case of war. This contention is true in so far as it relates to the manufacture of guns, other armament, and powder. The Government should give a part of its business to those engaged in such ventures, as they are of great strength in time of war, and we can not afford to do without them. It is vastly different in the matter of armor. A nation must have its naval supremacy at the beginning of war and can not obtain it during the continuance of the war. It takes from two to three years to construct a battleship, and hence the armor plate for battleships is mostly produced in times of peace, to be ready for war. The increase in the demand for armor plate does not amount to as much in time of war as does the increase in the demand for arms and munitions. The wise course for the Government to pursue is to own an armor plant sufficiently large to manufacture for its needs in time of peace and carry out its naval programs, with facilities for enlarging the plant in time of war, if necessary.

The experience of the Government in the manufacture of guns, mines, powder, and torpedoes has been most satisfactory, and I do not believe there is anyone who would favor the Government retracing its steps in these directions. In 1897 the Government paid $1 a pound for smokeless powder of the general character at present in use. This price was gradually reduced until in 1912 the Government paid 60 cents per pound. That year the price was fixed by Congress at 53 cents per pound, which is the price the Government has since paid for the powder it purchased outside. The Government now manufactures much of its powder, which, including overhead charges, costs it about 38 cents a pound. During the past three years the Government has manufactured 7,263,409 pounds of powder, costing it in all, including everything, $2,680,000. If the Government had purchased this powder outside, at the present price of 53 cents per pound, it would have cost about $1,169,000 more. The Government has saved this amount in three years on its powder purchases.

Three years ago we had no satisfactory naval mines; and Secretary Daniels, to get the type approved by the ordnance authorities, had to go to England. In his contract with the Vickers Co. he made arrangements for the manufacture of their mine by this Government upon the payment of a royalty, and it has been proved that these mines can and have been manufactured for $145 apiece less than the Vickers price, as Vickers were unable to deliver them on account of the war. Already we have 31 mines for every 9 mines we had three years ago. The department is now asking for approximately $3,700,000 for the manufacture of mines. By manufacturing them, the department will be able with this sum of money to obtain about 1,800 more mines than it could obtain by purchase with the same money.

The Navy is now having great success in the manufacture of torpedoes. Three years ago its factories could manufacture only about 75 torpedoes a year, a number totally inadequate for its demands. It was dependent, therefore, upon private manufacturers for the bulk of its supply. Several years previous it had been necessary to make purchases in Europe, and within the last year the department has been obliged to invoke the aid of the courts to prevent the sale to foreign Governments of torpedoes manufactured by private concerns in this country and which embodied improvements suggested by American naval officers. Through good management and the employment of additional manufacturing facilities already existing, the Navy Department has been able not only to increase its output of torpedoes but to reduce the cost of manufacture. Congress in 1914, at the request of Secretary Daniels, authorized an expenditure of $260,000 to enlarge the department's facilities for manufacturing torpedoes.

When these extensions are completed the Navy itself will be able to manufacture about 400 torpedoes a year instead of a meager 75; and as they are being manufactured for about $1,100 less than they can be bought, the Navy will, by manufacturing torpedoes instead of buying them, save to the Government about $400,000 a year. Incidentally, it may be stated as evidence of the Navy's activities during the last three years that it has been accumulating torpedoes as well as mines. For every 100 torpedoes on hand or ordered March 1, 1913, 158 additional torpedoes have been ordered since that date.

The Government has had a most favorable experience in the manufacturing of guns. Secretary Daniels, in testifying before the Naval Committee of the House last year, stated that the Navy desired ten 14-inch guns, and asked the United States Army, the Midvale Co., and the Bethlehem Co. to submit bids for the construction of these guns. The Midvale and Bethlehem Cos. bid $79,000 each for these guns, and the Army bid $61,000. The award was made to the Army for the construction of these guns, saving the Government $18,000 on each gun, or $180,000 in all. I am told also that the guns, mines, and torpedoes manufactured by the Government are superior to those manufactured by private concerns.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Were the bids of the two companies, the Bethlehem Co. and the Midvale Co., identical?

Mr. SWANSON. They were identical; so stated by the Secretary.

The success that has attended the efforts of the Government in the manufacture of powder, guns, mines, and torpedoes fully justifies it in proceeding to manufacture its armor, where its success is more fully assured and the savings greater.

It is said in opposition to this bill that the Government is treating with gross injustice the three concerns that undertook the manufacture of armor at the suggestion of the Government and are now confronted with the possibility of a great loss if the Government should proceed to manufacture its own armor plate. Let us examine fairly and justly the transactions between the Government and these three companies and ascertain whether these concerns have not been treated fairly and generously by the Government. I am frank to say I would not favor this Government dealing unfairly, unjustly, or niggardly with any concern. The Government should be a fair and reasonable customer. If the Government of the United States in its transactions with these concerns has been liberal, and these companies have made large profits on account of these business transactions with the Government, then they can have no cause of complaint if the Government in the future should erect for its own use an armor-plate plant and manufacture armor in the best and most economical way.

Secretary Herbert, when he made his investigation and report to Congress, likewise took this position, and made an investigation as to what the profits of the Carnegie and Bethlehem companies had been through their transactions with the Government up to 1897. He did this with a view of ascertaining whether the Government has fairly and fully discharged its obligations to these two concerns on account of their undertaking the manufacture of armor plate. He examined the reports made by these concerns to the State authorities regarding their profits, the amount of business done with the Government, and the amount of business they had with others, and allowed a most liberal percentage of profit on business with private concerns. He thus reached a conclusion as to the profits made by these two companies in their transactions with the Government up to 1897. His examination of this subject was exhaustive and thorough.

He reported to Congress with regard to the Bethlehem Co. as follows:

> Whatever may have been the cost of the armor plant and the gun plant, whatever may have been paid for the secrets of manufacture or patents, whatever may have been the interest on working capital, all those and other charges were paid from the gross earnings of the company. Only net earnings have been considered, and the results show that the company's investment in plant to make armor and gun steel for the Government have been returned with 22 per cent thereon.

This was in 1897. Up to that time the Bethlehem Co. had only manufactured about 17,000 tons of armor for the Government, and since that time it has made and sold to the Government about 78,000 tons of armor, more than four times as much. Its sales to the Government of projectiles and other munitions since that time have increased in equally great proportion, and I doubt not with equal profits. I have a statement from the Navy Department showing me that since 1905 the Bethlehem Co. has received in payment for projectiles and gun forgings over $11,577,000. I have no doubt the purchases from 1897 to 1905 would equal if not exceed this.

There can be no question but that the United States Government has been one of the most profitable customers these companies have had, and that a large measure of their great prosperity has been due to their transactions with the United States Government. There is no question but that one of their chief sources of profit has been their transactions with the Government. Any obligation that this Government may be under to these companies has long since been fully discharged by the large and liberal profits made by them in their transaction with the Government.

In examining the transactions of the Carnegie Co. in the same manner, Secretary Herbert stated:

> These estimates show that this company's business, done entirely by its armor plant, has netted to it 10 per cent profit after the amortization of its plant.

This was in 1897. Up to that time the Carnegie Co. had furnished to the Government 12,650 tons of armor. Since that time it has furnished the Government 77,283 tons, more than six times as much, it is presumed with equal profit. It can be readily understood from these figures why these companies are not willing for the Government to examine their books to ascertain the profits they have derived from their transactions with the Government.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator must acknowledge that these companies have offered to allow the Government to examine their books.

Mr. SWANSON. I have so stated—if it is treated as confidential.

The Midvale Co., since it began manufacturing armor, has furnished the Government 48,399 tons of armor plate, at an average price of $420 per ton. This is about four times the amount furnished by the Carnegie Co., on which Secretary Herbert estimated this company had made 10 per cent and paid for its plant. Since 1905 the Midvale Co. has also furnished the Government over $7,916,000 worth of projectiles and gun forgings. In addition the Bethlehem, Carnegie, and Midvale Cos. have supplied large quantities of iron and steel in all of its varied forms. All three of these companies have derived immense profits from their transactions with the Government, and are not justified in making any complaint of unfair treatment by the Government should it see fit to manufacture its own armor. The Government has been the best customer of these three concerns and the best source of profit. There is no reason in the contention that the Government would act unfairly if it should pass this bill as recommended by the committee.

Desirous of encouraging these plants in order to have munition plants in this country, the Government has acted toward them with the utmost generosity and liberality. Desirous of treating these concerns with the utmost consideration, the committee has authorized the Secretary of the Navy to erect or purchase an armor plant, or do both. If the owners of these plants desire, they can sell their plants to the Government at a fair and reasonable price and sustain no loss in this respect. If they do not desire to sell their plants, they can, under the terms of this bill, dispose of their machinery and tools and other equipment. In 1897 the Bethlehem and Carnegie Cos., through their officers, offered to sell their plants to the Government at a fair and reasonable price, and it is presumed they are willing to do so at this time.

Thus, Mr. President, from whatever standpoint it may be viewed, the pending measure is just, fair, and reasonable. It proposes that the large profits arising from the manufacture of armor plate shall remain with the Government and no longer go to private individuals. It proposes to have a plant where the secrets of the Government in connection with the construction of armor can be protected and used alone by this Government. The manufacturers of armor in their testimony clearly indicated that they are unable to manufacture armor as cheaply and economically as the Government. The bill proposes to prevent this economic waste, and to permit these concerns to go into other profitable undertakings. It gives an opportunity to the owners of these plants to dispose of them to the Government at a fair and reasonable price. The bill will place one of the chief elements of our defense and security in the hands of the Government, where it can safely rest, and not make it dependent upon the self-interests of individuals.

The passage of this bill will mark the end of the domination of the notorious Armor Plate Trust, which for more than 16 years has levied immense exactions upon the Government of the United States. It indicates no intention on the part of the Government to engage in private business and commerce, but its desire is to obtain its own armor in the best and most economical way and in a manner that preserves its valuable secrets and new discoveries.

This bill is fair and just to the Government, fair and just to those engaged in manufacturing armor, and should be promptly passed by Congress. Every delay in this matter is attended with dangers, and Congress should act promptly and decisively upon a matter of such vast and far-reaching importance.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, before making the brief address which I intend to make upon this subject, I will say that I shall be glad to be interrupted at any time by any Senator who may desire to do so.

I approach this matter from an entirely different point of view, I think, from that of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] or any of the other Senators who have spoken in support of this bill. I can claim some familiarity with the subject. These three concerns are located in Pennsylvania. For 25 years I have had opportunities to visit them and to familiarize myself, so far as a layman can, with the intricacies of their manufacture and the details of their management. I do not claim any particular originality for what I am going to say now, because the facts are found in the hearings before the Senate Naval Committee and in the various circular forms of information which have been submitted to Senators. I want to say now that in the many hearings which have been held before the committees of both branches of Congress on the question of armor plate during the last 20 years I know of no hearings more concise or more illuminating than those held by the Naval Committee in the present instance.

In the first place, Mr. President, much has been said regarding the absence of competition in connection with the manufacture of armor plate. I make the statement fearlessly that there is no real competition in the manufacture of this article, and there can not be, from its very nature. There is only one customer, the United States Government, and that one customer is without an assured program or a definite policy; so that at no time have these establishments been worked to their full capacity, and frequently they have been lying idle.

The first concern to go into this business was the Bethlehem concern, I suppose in a spirit of enterprise, as an addition to an ordnance factory, and perhaps, some of us may conceive, with an element of patriotism among enterprising metallurgists and steel manufacturers to have armor plate made in America. Anyhow, they went into the business on the invitation of the American Government, conveyed not only personally by the heads of the Navy Department and the other departments of the Government, but in response to advertisements published in different newspapers. A little later on the Carnegie Co. went into the business in the same way, and finally the Midvale concern, almost entirely at the request of the United States Government to have as many private concerns as possible manufacture armor plate.

Until the last three or four years it always has been the policy of the American Government and of all Governments to encourage initiative and individual enterprise in the manufacture of the munitions of war. One of the first resolutions passed by the American Congress was addressed to Alexander Hamilton, asking him to report to Congress how individual manufacture of the munitions of war could be encouraged; and it has been only at this late day, in the last two or three years, that the doctrine has grown up in the United States that the Government should manufacture all or a large part of the munitions of war. For the previous one hundred and forty-odd years of our national existence it had been the definite policy of the Government to do nothing itself that the individual could do for the Government; and it was the policy of the Government to encourage the individual in every way, so that these great establishments in time of war or in case of necessity might be mobilized for the national needs. Up to the present time I do not know of a single civilized nation, with the exception of Japan—which has been compelled to do so—which manufactures armor plate itself, or, to any extent, any of the munitions of war. Many of these Governments are paternal in their character, and yet there is not one of them but that has done all in its power to encourage the manufacturers of armor and of other munitions.

It has been the policy of the United States Government during the last twenty-odd years, in dealing with these manufacturers of armor, to distribute the contracts so that they all would have work and be able to remain in existence in case the Government should have to fall back upon them in time of war. Much criticism is made because all of the contract is not given to one concern at a lowest figure. It is true that it has not been so given, Mr. President; but in dividing these contracts it has been done deliberately, with a statesmanlike foresight, to keep them all maintained and operated.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has referred to this fact. He overlooks the fact—and he is one of the most persistent advocates of it in the naval appropriation bill—that when we authorize two or more battleships we often provide that not more than one shall be built in any one yard, or not more than one shall be built upon the Atlantic seaboard, or that at least one shall be built upon the Pacific seaboard. If the Navy Department or the Congress pursued the policy which the Senator from Virginia insists upon in connection with armor plate, he ought logically to demand that all the battleships should be awarded to the lowest bidder in one navy yard, if it has the capacity to construct them; but the American Congress, without criticism, has followed the other policy, and, in my opinion, it has been a wise one. The same policy has been adopted in connection with the distribution of the work for armor plate.

The business is not, and can not be, competitive. The test is not whether the Government is getting a competitive price, but whether the Government is getting the armor plate for a reasonable price. No Senator can dispute the fact that when we are getting armor plate at a very much lower figure than that paid by any other nation in the world we are getting it at a reasonable price, because what is reasonable must necessarily be comparative. Other nations do not even exact, as we do, the lowest reasonable price, but are willing to pay very liberal amounts to the manufacturers of armor in order to have these great establishments to fall back upon in case of national need. It is not a strictly commercial business, but is a proposition involving the maintenance of munition factories to be mobilized in case of war. So when the Senator from Virginia and other Senators talk about competition and talk about the lowest price, they seem to me to have an entire misconception of the problem involved.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. It is conceded, I understand, that in this country there is only one customer for the product of these armor-plate factories.

Mr. PENROSE. I so stated.

Mr. POMERENE. If there are three factories, separate and distinct concerns, under separate and distinct management, will the Senator tell me why three different prices can not be given by these three different concerns? That, if I understand it, is competition.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, even conceding for the sake of argument that there were different prices, supposing that by reason of geographical situation—being nearer the seaboard, perhaps, or for any other reason—the Midvale Co. could bid lower upon armor plate than the Carnegie Co., I for one would advocate giving part of this armor plate to the Carnegie Co. in order to keep that establishment alive, just as I advocate building a battleship on the Pacific seaboard, costing more than it would cost upon the Atlantic seaboard. I believe it to be a wise and a statesmanlike policy for the Government to have these great munition factories to fall back upon; and rather than award the whole contract to any one concern because it was the lowest bidder, I say here fearlessly before the Senate that I would advocate giving part of the contract at a higher price to one of the other concerns.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether he does not think the United States is now in a better position with regard to powder than it was before it began the manufacture of powder? Now when war comes we will have our own powder factory at Indianhead and our own powder factory in New Jersey, besides the private powder manufactories. Meanwhile, we have demonstrated the price at which powder can be manufactured. We have compelled the powder factories to reduce the price of their powder to the United States year by year, and in case of war we have two strings to our bow. We have the Government powder factories and the private powder factories. Are we not now in a better position because we have undertaken the manufacturing of powder in Government factories, and would not a similar result follow in the case of making armor plate?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Nebraska has addressed the inquiry to me. I had intended to touch upon the subject to which he refers. The analogy between the manufacture of armor plate and that of powder is to my mind entirely fallacious. In the first place, the Government is one of the smallest customers for powder. The independent and individual powder concerns do the vast amount of their business with the mining industry, and with arms companies that are not military companies, and in other directions. In the case of armor plate, only one customer exists, and when that customer ceases to order these plants go out of existence.

In addition to that, the formula for making powder is comparatively simple, whereas the process for making armor plate represents the highest point to which the art of metallurgy has reached, requiring the longest experience, the highest talent, and the rarest kind, I may say, of genius in metallurgy.

Further, Admiral Strauss himself says:

> We have been very successful in manufacturing powder profitably, and we had one advantage in the manufacture of powder, and that is that we took all of our output, and ever since the plant has been built we have worked day and night and took every pound of powder that we could make, and that has contributed to the success of the plant, undoubtedly.

Whereas in the case of armor with the plant contemplated in this bill, we have no assurance that it would ever in any program the Government is likely to adopt beyond the present and immediate needs employ more than 50 per cent or much less of its capacity.

Admiral Strauss before the Naval Committee further said—I do not have it at hand; it is in the hearings somewhere—that the French Government manufactured all the powder it has used, and he did not consider it a desirable or a good thing for the Government to do all of it, and that he did not believe it had worked well in the case of France.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to dispute that proposition right now. If we may judge by the course of the present war, France has been in an infinitely better condition manufacturing her own powder than Great Britain has, which was compelled to depend on private manufacturers.

Mr. PENROSE. Perhaps the Senator and I are not warriors of the experience of Admiral Strauss. I will read what Admiral Strauss said:

> I think it is well for the Government to have competition in producing munitions as well as anyone else. We have an example in France of the Government monopolizing the manufacture of powder, and it has not worked particularly well. I think the Government factories need competition, in order to stir them on both as to quality and price, just as well as we need competition among private manufacturers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems to me the testimony of Admiral Strauss hardly bears out the argument the Senator is now making. Admiral Strauss seemed to think that competition between the Government and the private individuals is desirable, yet the Senator is arguing that there should be no Government competition in the manufacture of armor.

Mr. PENROSE. There would be no competition if this bill passes, because the three private establishments would be immediately extinguished.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That will be only upon one theory, that the three private establishments will find that the Government will be able to manufacture the armor cheaper than they can afford to sell it.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator, with all due respect to him, seems to be entirely misinformed as to the situation. As I understand it, the law requires, where the Government establishes a manufacturing plant of this kind, that it shall be given the preference and do the work to its full capacity before any contract or purchase is made of private individuals. This governmental armor-plate factory would produce all and more than all the armor plate that the Government will ever need. So how can private concerns continue in the business when there is only one customer?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know the law the Senator refers to, but I know this to be true: We have been paying 53 cents a pound to private concerns to manufacture our powder when we were making it in Government plants at less than 40 cents a pound. I know that for some years the Government has been manufacturing its powder at less cost than it was paying to the manufacturers; yet it continued to buy from the manufacturers and to restrain the development of the Government plant in order to keep the factories going. So I think the Senator is hardly warranted in saying that there is any law which discriminates very seriously against private manufactures.

Mr. OLIVER. If my colleague will yield, I suggest that the history of governmental experience in powder is not carried out when it comes to the experience of the Government in building its own warships, because I think I am right in saying that never yet has the Government constructed in its navy yard a ship that was built at the same cost as its sister ship built in a private shipyard. Notwithstanding this experience, the Government is still going on keeping the ways in the Government yards filled with ships and only giving to the private yards what may be termed the excess.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit me?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator is so good-natured that I dislike to impose upon him; but occasionally some one rises here in this and the other body and states what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] has just said. It is a controversy that has been raging for a number of years, and I do not think it ever will be settled. When a Senator makes that statement it becomes necessary for some one of the other school of thought to interpolate an objection.

My understanding of the true situation with reference to the test which the Senator spoke of a little while ago, is that a Government-built ship showed to advantage over the private-built ship in the famous case of the Louisiana and Connecticut. It is true on the surface the figures would seem to indicate that the Louisiana was built for less money than the Connecticut; but the Scientific American, at the time the two ships were built, instituted a pretty complete, thorough, and comprehensive system of observation, and gave it as its opinion that the Connecticut, considering the character of the work that was put upon it—the Government yard beat the private yard, both as to quality and quantity, and the Connecticut, the Government-built ship coming from the Brooklyn Navy Yard, was made the flagship of the fleet.

It was stated subsequently that it cost more for repairing the Connecticut. The same authority demonstrated that the character of the changes that were made—not important changes, but changes in her armament and changes in her equipment—became necessary because she was made the flagship of the fleet. Ship for ship, she was superior in every way. She emerged triumphant from that contest. According to the authority I quote, the Government-built ship was the best ship. But that is not all. Government competition has speeded up the building of ships two or three years. Government competition has reduced the price of ships.

I am sorry to have injected this interruption.

Mr. PENROSE. No; we are not discussing ships now.

Mr. HUGHES. But the Senator was so good-natured and extended the invitation at the beginning of his remarks that I ventured to take advantage of it.

Mr. OLIVER. If my colleague will allow me, I will merely say that the records of those ships are better than the opinion of the Scientific American, and you will find that of those two ships the Louisiana was infinitely superior and was built for three or four hundred thousand dollars less than the Connecticut. You will also find that the Utah was a better ship, built by contract for $2,265,000 less than the Florida, and so on down all along the line.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course, if the Senator will permit me, it ought to be stated in all fairness to the Government employees of the navy yards that the ship Connecticut was built under absolutely ideal labor conditions. It was built by men working eight hours a day and receiving the highest pay paid by the community in which they operated, who are receiving 30 days' leave a year, and in every other way operating and working as we would like to see all American citizens operate and work. That necessarily ran the cost of the ship up; but I still believe and maintain it to be true that under any fair and proper system of cost accounting and charges the Government-built ship will compare favorably with any private-built ship that ever has been constructed.

Mr. PENROSE. A total misconception seems to exist with relation to these armor-plate plants to the general business of the steel companies which own them. In the case of the Carnegie Co. the armor-plate department is the most insignificant part of their enormous business, as must be obvious to anyone familiar with the annual business of the United States Steel Corporation. In the case of the Bethlehem Steel Co. I have here a newspaper clipping stating that their net earnings for 1915 were nearly $25,000,000, and that during the time when the armor-plate plant was idle and not making anything. The million and a half the armor-plate plant might have received on their share of the distribution of the contract for armor plate, allowing all of it as gross profit, and assuming that the armor was manufactured for nothing or out of revenues applied from other parts of the establishment, would have only given a gross profit of 20 per cent. All sides seem to agree—the Tillman committee, Mr. Grace, the president of the Bethlehem Co., and others who have testified—that, taking the Senate committee's own figures, the profit at the best was between 7 and 8 per cent.

Therefore it can be shown without going into any great amount of accounting that not only has it never been a profitable business, but that it is a comparatively small part of the affairs of these great establishments.

These gentlemen, as I have said, have gone into this industry in a spirit of enterprise, I suppose, in a spirit of patriotism, certainly on the invitation of the American Government. They are in it, and they naturally resent the treatment which they are receiving, and are opposed to a Government plant that would absolutely render valueless the comparatively small investment which they have therein.

Much comment has been made upon the fact that on numerous occasions armor plate has been sold to foreign countries at a lower price than that furnished the American Government. Mr. President, there is not an armor-plate manufacturing concern in England or Germany or France that has not sold armor plate to other nations cheaper than they are furnishing it to their own Government, and in the case of the American manufacturers, the instances referred to were for very small amounts and occurred many years ago. But it is the policy of England, France, and Germany, who are certainly as civilized countries as America and who undoubtedly carry military efficiency far beyond anything we have any conception of, to pay liberal prices for armor plate, and keep up these vast concerns as a military proposition and not to treat them as if they were selling mules and hats and shoes and other articles that can be sold anywhere throughout the country.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just stated that in other countries the armor-plate factories sell more cheaply to foreign countries than they do to their own Government.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator tell us how much cheaper these sales are made to foreign Governments than to their own several home Governments?

Mr. PENROSE. No; I have not those figures. The statement was made before the Naval Committee, but it was not considered of sufficient importance to go into that feature of it. The difference is no greater than $15 a ton, I think, in the American instance, and it is not a very large matter to be concerned about. These transactions occurred as they do in commerce of all kinds in order to secure a market or perhaps to compete with other foreign manufacturers, and it may be at a loss. Anyhow they are but few and far between and occurred so long ago that it is hardly worth while to take up my limited time to pursue this matter further.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some years ago, I have forgotten the exact date, I submitted a resolution to the Senate asking the Secretary of State to make inquiry through our ministers and consuls abroad as to what the custom was in other countries of selling at certain times their products more cheaply abroad than at home. It was ascertained and communicated to the Senate that it was almost a universal custom that accumulated goods, not finding a ready home market, were disposed of to people in other countries at a less rate than the domestic price.

I know that a great many manufacturing establishments of this country in textile industries and woolen industries often find a surplus on hand that they have got to dispose of or perhaps close their factories for a time, not finding any home market, and they are sent abroad and disposed of for what they will bring. I apprehend that this transaction was of that character.

Mr. PENROSE. I assume that owing to the uncertain policy of the American Government these concerns were not working to their full capacity at the time, and were glad to sell at cost or probably at less to foreign countries a small amount of armor in order to possibly secure a market.

Mr. President, there is no activity in the arts and sciences that has made the extraordinary progress that has been made in the iron and steel industry. In the last 30 years it has developed many men of extraordinary genius for metallurgy and mechanical development and invention and for business expansion. The names of many of these men are known all over the United States and known all over the world. They have transformed the industry; they have raised it to a height which was never dreamt of by the pioneers who first developed it in western Pennsylvania and in other parts of the country. In no branch of the industry has the development been more extraordinary than in the art of making armor plate.

It is perhaps a process requiring as prolonged and delicate and as careful manipulation and attention and skilled knowledge as any other process in metallurgy. How can we expect the graduates of Annapolis to ever cope with those men who have the supply of extraordinary talented men to draw upon, who are developed in the industrial affairs of the country?

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. PENROSE. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to one phase of this matter which I do not think has been discussed, and that is the testimony of Admiral Strauss to the effect that the Government hopes by having a Government plant to improve the quality of the armor and to get this advantage.

Mr. PENROSE. I was coming to that point, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator let me state it? I did not know that the Senator was going to state it.

Mr. PENROSE. I am just coming to what the Senator has in mind. I am approaching it now.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not know that the Senator can tell what is in my mind.

Mr. PENROSE. I am a kind of mind reader.

Mr. CHILTON. I will state it, however, and if the Senator has read my thought it will not hurt. My thought was that the testimony of Admiral Strauss was to the effect that many of the improvements, in fact a majority of the improvements in armor plate, have been suggested by the Government officers for the reason that they do the testing of armor plate. There is a large percentage of the armor plate bought which is used for testing purposes, and they make the tests and by those tests they determine what is needed in the armor plate to meet the improvement in projectiles.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand the Senator's question. I anticipated it and I was just going to approach that subject. I speak with the greatest respect for the graduates of the Naval Academy and for the officers of the Navy, and in the same way of the officers of the Army. They receive an extraordinary discipline and education in the two academies, they represent a fine type of American intelligence and manhood, and it is no criticism of them to say that skill in metallurgy is no more to be expected to be found among them than it is to be found among any other profession—lawyers, or doctors, or ministers, or I care not what—whose education and time has not been applied to the study of that subject.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will wait one minute, until I get through answering the Senator from West Virginia, I will state that this is a most complicated metallurgical process, as I have said, requiring the genius of men who have been brought up in the business and developed it. If Government ownership had prevailed in the time of Alexander Hamilton and we had relied on any such novel doctrine as is now promulgated in the American Congress, and naval officers and civilians in the Navy Department had been placed in charge of the protection of the old wooden frigates, we would not have gotten very far from the wooden frigate to-day.

The inventions, the processes, the progress made in the development of armor plate have been almost exclusively the result of individual enterprise, individual financial expenditures, individual courage in going into the business at a possible loss and carrying it through to a success. I will now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was going to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether it had not been very well demonstrated in a number of other departments of the Government that the United States is capable of securing the very highest scientific talent. I refer, for instance, to the Department of Agriculture, where——

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator will let me answer without elaborating, because my time is very limited.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In the Department of Agriculture—in the Bureau of Standards——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I decline to be interrupted for a speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania declines to yield further.

Mr. PENROSE. With all desire to be courteous, having only a few minutes more, as two Senators follow me and we are to vote at 4 o'clock, I will answer the Senator's inquiry, but I do not want to wait for a speech. It is not the business of these Navy officers to be on shore manufacturing. Their profession calls them to be upon the ocean and to be upon battleships and to familiarize themselves and exercise their profession as navigators, as men in charge of cruisers and dreadnaughts and submarines, and to have them in Philadelphia or at Bethlehem, on shore all their lives, or to be removed just as soon as they are beginning to learn the art is, I say, so ridiculous that I can not conceive how it can appeal to a man of intelligence. The Government has not paid the salaries which would ever induce men, fit and competent, to go into a Government armor-plant factory, men with ability and industry to be successful manufacturers of armor. A man with the ability and the industry to be a successful manufacturer of armor can advance himself and do better in his profession by remaining with private enterprise rather than drag his days along in a Government position on a Government salary.

With the exception, Mr. President, of the comparatively small and simple manufacture of gunpowder the Government has never gone into manufacturing in the strict acceptation of the word. The Government has assembled materials which to the ordinary civilian may appear like manufacturing, but it is not. In that case the Government has not covered the operations of manufacturing, because, as it was observed here this morning, the Government will have to buy pig iron which these concerns now manufacture, and it will not have the coal mines and the iron ore and the other sources of supply which these concerns now own.

When the Government makes a so-called gun it gets the forgings from Bethlehem. When the Government builds a battleship it buys the propeller and the plates and the masts and almost everything that enters into the battleship from individuals, and it takes them to the Government navy yard and assembles them and puts them together. It is not a manufacturing business in the sense that armor plate is manufactured. This proposition is as radical a departure from anything the United States Government or any Government has ever attempted to do as it is possible to imagine.

With the passage of this bill these concerns will go out of business. No other civilized Government in the world would contemplate for a moment extinguishing three plants of this kind in the ruthless way which we now contemplate.

We talk about preparedness and at the same time we are deliberately destroying one of the most important elements in the problem. Where would England be to-day without her four or five armor-plate establishments to fall back upon to supply her pressing needs? Where would Germany be? Where would any of the Governments now engaged in this dreadful struggle be to-day if they did not have some private individual concerns to mobilize and fall back upon? Certainly government plants only built to supply government routine necessities do not constitute a great reliance in time of war when we may want a thousand-fold capacity of any government plant.

Here is what Hudson Maxim says:

Government encouragement should be given to the private munitions factories, but they should not be put under governmental ownership, according to a pamphlet written by Hudson Maxim and circulated among Members of Congress by the American Defense Society. Mr. Maxim is a member of the advisory board of the Navy Department and of the advisory board of the Defense Society.

"As a result of the European war American industries have largely been enlisted for the production of munitions of war for the allies," according to the pamphlet. "They have largely been financed with foreign capital. Old munitions works have been enlarged, many of them fiftyfold, some a hundredfold. Many new works have been built all over the country, and the high prices that have been paid by the allies under the stress of their necessities will make all of the new works velvet for the manufacturers, with a large profit besides.

"It is estimated by the most reliable authorities that the capacity of the United States at this writing to make war munitions of all kinds as a whole is between four hundred and five hundred times as great as it was at the time the European war broke out. Should war come to-day, private manufacturers would be able to make more than a thousand times as large a quantity of munitions as would the Government.

"If we should have war with any of the great powers, we should need not only all of these great private plants, but also more."

Admiral Strauss admits that it would take several years to complete this plant. He also declares in his testimony before the Naval Committee that more or less failure would follow. So the whole question of preparedness is being deliberately jeopardized and imperiled, if not entirely destroyed, on account of this uncalled-for attempt at this most unpropitious time for Government ownership. To-day materials are more expensive than ever before known in the iron and steel business, on account of the war in Europe.

Some of the equipment necessary for an armor-plate manufacturing plant may be entirely unobtainable. In the meanwhile, with the passage of this measure, the Government pledges itself to Government ownership of armor-plate manufacturing and the private concerns are compelled to go out of business and proceed to the amortization of their plants. The outlook, to my mind, is so deplorable and so distressing from every point of view that I can only utter the sincere hope that before this bill completes its final parliamentary course it will fail of passage.

I should like, Mr. President, to discuss other phases of this question, but they have been so fully covered that I do not believe it is necessary for me to do so. I have preferred to confine my remarks to a few of the leading features of the situation which have always appealed to me from my practical knowledge of the industry. I am informed that other Senators are to follow me and, as we proceed to vote upon this bill at 4 o'clock, I shall detain the Senate but a moment longer.

The manufacturers of armor plate have made every offer to the Government that they could. They have presented the auditor's or accountant's report on the cost of armor for the battleship Pennsylvania to the Naval Committee and submitted it to the Secretary of the Navy, with the offer that they should examine all the details of the cost and profit to satisfy them just what the profits were upon that particular battleship. They have been at all times willing to furnish the Secretary of the Navy with information as to their business. That they are not willing to have it published to the world is no more a cause for criticism of them than it is a subject of criticism of the hundreds of thousands of corporations and individuals who make income-tax reports to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that they are unwilling that their affairs should be published to the world, and it is wisely made a penal offense to disclose them.

Notwithstanding the fact that the price charged the Government for the manufacture of armor plate by these three concerns is about the same, they are separate entities; they have their separate and distinct organizations and their own competition. That was illustrated by the statement of my colleague [Mr. OLIVER] this morning when he showed how some of the concerns are able to furnish certain munitions, while the Midvale is paying a fine of $25,000 a month and is unable to come up to the specifications.

Every year the cost of armor plate has been added to by legislation in Congress. The eight-hour law imposed great burdens upon the manufacture of this article. Wages have been steadily going up ever since the art of armor manufacturing was first instituted and established in the United States; and yet, notwithstanding all that, the price of armor has been steadily going down until the last price was $425 a ton. This year, in view of the large program which was contemplated by the Government, an offer was made, in case the program was carried through, to furnish armor for $390 a ton. The armor-plate manufacturers even went to the Secretary of the Navy and offered to sit down with him, as the executive head of the department, and discuss the matter and try to arrive at a price which might be satisfactory to him; but their representations fell upon deaf ears, because the administration appears to be determined to have this bill passed and to launch the Government upon the perilous and doubtful course of Government ownership of the very last thing which the Government should undertake to own.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I do not flatter myself that I shall change the opinion of any Member of the Senate on the pending measure, nor do I assume to be the sponsor for the mental processes of anyone in reaching a conclusion as to how he shall vote; but I must speak for myself, because when I first learned of the pending measure to erect a Government armor plant, I confess I felt myself inclined to favor it, notwithstanding the fact that I maintain a feeling of opposition to the broadening of Government operations to a trespass in the field of private enterprise in any and every field. I think I had gathered, concerning the manufacture of armor plate, the impression which is popular, that is, that armor-plate making has been the source of enormous gain to the few engaged therein. Moreover, it has seemed very reasonable to me that if there is any line of production which the Government might reasonably enter it is in the line of armor plate, arms, and ammunition—any or all the agencies of war.

I recognize the popularity of the proposition embodied in the pending bill. More, it is easy to see the effectiveness of such a policy in disarming the opposition to preparedness, because a very large part of the hostility to preparedness is fixed on the assumption that producers of munitions and builders of war vessels are inspiring the preparedness campaign for their own selfish gain. Senators must dismiss this last assumption as unworthy, else they will impugn their own motives and question the honor and patriotism of everyone in responsible position who stands for any considerable program of preparedness.

Let us dismiss for all time the suspicion that any action of Congress relating to the national defense is influenced by selfish, private motives and move along in devotion to duty, confident of such public approval and support as the merit of our ultimate action commands.

A study of the report of the hearings on which the committee's recommendation is founded, aloof from the acerbity of the distinguished chairman, reveals that a governmental plant is not proposed because of unsatisfactory service, not because of a lack of capacity, but because of a lack of knowledge of the exact profits of the large concerns engaged in serving the Government. I have studied the hearings very carefully, Mr. President, and I can reach no other conclusion than that this whole movement is inspired by the suspicion or conviction that somebody has been making enormous profits in serving the Government. Expressed in plain English, there is a fear or a conviction that those who make armor plate for the Navy are inordinately profiting through their operations; that there is essentially no competition; that the Government is excessively charged, and it is more or less of a crime to make money.

I know something of the popularity of inveighing against enormous money-making, honest or otherwise. It is a great "hit," not peculiar to any State or section, to swat the great captains of industry, particularly the wizards of the world of iron and steel, because they have developed stupendously and made great fortunes in that development. They have made a million dollars look "like 30 cents," so to speak, but in doing so they have made these United States the greatest iron and steel producing nation on the earth, and iron and steel prices make a more dependable business barometer than wheat and cotton, and the glow of the furnaces make a beacon of American material good fortune.

I will assume that there has been some good ground for suspecting greed in not a few instances; doubtless there has been "hoggishness," as the able chairman of the Naval Committee expresses it, but that need not becloud our vision or make us hostile to the great body of wonder-workers who have wrought the marvel of iron and steel. Great compensation itself involves no crime. Any Senator's mail will certify to the friendship for the people of a noted lawyer whose name is very familiar to this body, yet I read in the Senate hearings concerning this same eminent lawyer that he received a fee of $220,000 in one case. I assume our vision is influenced by the viewpoint, but I have never expected to earn that much money in the 50 years ordinarily allotted to the average man for his business or professional activities.

The point I am aiming at is that large profits and high compensations are only relative, after all, and we may all deplore the day when talent and genius and industry turned to money-making become a crime in this country. At any rate, the armor-plate problem is not to be best solved in a prejudice against the men who have succeeded. For myself—and Senators will agree, I hope—we ought to settle this question on one explicit issue—what is best for the American Republic?

Let us put aside the immediately popular thing. I know what that is. Nine men in 10 would say, "Down with monopoly, up with the Federal armor plant." I have confessed to my own inclination to favor that policy. I know why I felt that way, and it is not unreasonable to believe the popular mind has been fixed by the same impressions. The people have heard only one side. The hearings were a revelation to me. The public has little heard the side of the armor plants. It is rare that a newspaper and rarer that a politician will disseminate their story. It would sound too much like a boost for the business rather than a swat at the barons. There is no popularity in that.

Few people know that armor plants are given over exclusively to making armor for the Government and are fit for little or nothing else. Few people understand that these special plants have been developed at the instance of the Government to meet a Government need. Few people realize that the undertaking is so enormous that only immense capital and highly organized enterprise may safely venture upon the manufacture of armor. Rarely anybody has thought, much less spoken, of the enormous losses in investment due to obsolescense. Not very many have ever stopped to think—I know I had not—that Federal assumption of the manufacture of armor plate will put out of business and render little more than scrap these great plants, representing approximately $20,000,000 of investments, though these investments were made exclusively to serve the United States Government. Of course it was expected to profit in the serving. It is not a governmental policy to ask something for nothing. If the truth were told in the hearings, and there is no contradiction, the business has not been half so profitable in these monopolistic dealings with the Government as the steel business has been in the commercial world of competition.

I ought to add in passing that I had not thought to discuss the question of prices, which has been so thoroughly covered, but I have been able to learn, quite unexpectedly, a few things that have not been introduced in this discussion. For example, Mr. President, not so very long ago a naval attaché, who was employed for a number of years in the work of inspection on behalf of the Government in the armor plants, told me that on more than one occasion in one day he had directed the destruction of $40,000 worth of unsatisfactory armor, which, of course, becomes in large part a loss to the producer. The same trustworthy informant told me that on one occasion, while he was inspecting the process of armor making at the Midvale plant, there came a run of steel that was unsatisfactory, and that plant spent $50,000 investigating the cause of that unsatisfactory steel. These things are seldom spoken of, and there has been no reckoning in any of the debate that I have thus far heard of these excessive sources of cost.

While I am referring to the question of cost, I want to take up another phase for a moment. I know a little something of business myself, in a very small way. I speak of one form of business where the competition is unceasing, and it is a rule of that business—and if any Senator becomes curious I will tell him what it is—when you find the cost of labor and material, to add 33⅓ per cent for various factory and proprietorship expenses. When that 33⅓ per cent has been added, that becomes the basic cost, and, by universal rule throughout this country, 25 per cent is then added for profit. If you will apply these figures to any of the statements made in the hearings as to the factory cost of armor plate, you will see that armor at $421 per ton as the cost of armor is a very reasonable figure, and that the calculation I have related contemplates no extraordinary loss like those to which I have just referred.

Mr. President, there are two questions pressing in my own mind to answer when I vote on the pending bill. First, Is the Government being supplied with armor plate at a fair and reasonable price at the hands of private enterprise? Second, Will the Government be helped or hindered by the operation of a Federal plant? We may reasonably put aside all others.

Much of, nay all of, the agitation had its beginning in the first question. It is highly commendable to safeguard the Government as a purchaser, but it is quite as worthy to treat fairly the producer. There has been a persistent endeavor to dig out the detailed information about profits on the contracts of the past, since modern naval construction made the demand for armor. There have been investigations and reports, and the makers confirm the reports. It is not disputed that every opportunity was given Government agents to inquire into cost. The makers went so far as to tender their own confidential figures, with one stipulation—they were not to be made public—and I think that one stipulation is the stone in the path of many who would like to deal fairly with the makers of armor plate.

I can understand that request. It is not mysterious; it does not imply a hidden greed. Any business man has a right to feel that way about the business which is the creation of his talent, courage, and industry. If I had been Secretary of the Navy I should have examined those confidential reports, and I should have said to the public I believed either that the Government was fairly treated or that it was unfairly treated. A high public official committed to a trust could allay the public apprehension or confirm it, whereas the official recommendation for a Federal plant confirms the popular suspicion after a refusal to render these factors in our commercial life the hearing which the most ordinary offender might expect. I regret the declination, not because I believe it lacking in justification, but because I believe it would have disarmed every opponent of the purchase of armor from the private producer.

However, the actual process cost is not in marked dispute. The uncertainties lie in the additions for profits, for interest on capital, for overhead charges, for obsolescence, and for loss in meeting tests. The Government will have these costs, in fact or theory, but they will never be noted. The private producers must count risks and losses; in a Government undertaking they are swallowed up in deficiencies or obscurities, and no note is ever taken.

Comparative price is a reasonably safe guide to the fair price of any article. If I get a suit of clothes at a like cost to that which my neighbor pays, I have suffered no glaring extortion. If this Government secures armor at a price similar to that paid by the other great naval powers, the American cost can not be far from a reasonable one. Exhibit B, carried in the report of the hearings, giving figures taken from the Naval Yearbook, quotes the following prices per ton paid by European nations for Krupp side armor: Austria, $511; Italy, $405; Germany, $490; France, $460; England, $503; Russia, $368; Japan, $490; United States, $425. Quotations submitted to this Government for the ensuing five years vary from $395 to $525 per ton. Whatever the profits may have been, or are now, no one who knows the slightest thing of the relative cost of American and European labor can question the reasonableness of the American price. It is a wonderful tribute to American management and production that the higher cost of labor can be absorbed and this Government can be served at less than its great competitors for naval influence and power.

The other question; Will the country be helped or hindered by establishing its own plant?—concerns me more than price. There can be no impressive dispute about the advantages or disadvantages of price under the present proposals. But what about the needed armor? Preparedness is the big question of the hour, not of next year, or the next decade, but of this very day. The proposed naval program is more important than the military plan now pressing for adoption. The most ardent supporters of the Government entering into the armor business testify that two years will be required to build and develop a plant. The testimony of the experts in armor making places the time required at three or four years. We do not know that in five years it will be made an effective plant. I quite agree that everything is possible to this Government with its limitless resources and abundance of genius and talent, in the course of time, but the present situation demands the economy of time rather than the waste thereof. An incident will illustrate my thought. Several years ago, after the Government launched its enterprise of making ammunition, there was a great target-shooting match on the shores of New Jersey. Infantrymen from the Regular Army and from the National Guard competed in that test of marksmanship. A number of the best teams from the Ohio Guard, confident of their training, entered from my own State. They shot their best and made a miserable showing. They used Federal-made cartridges, unsuspecting of their inferior qualities. Annoyed at their failure, but still confident of their training, they made an investigation and found their missiles did not carry. They said little, and on their return to Ohio they resolved that they would try again on the succeeding year. The wise heads figured out a plan to make their own cartridges, and they bought privately made shells and privately made powder and loaded an ample supply in good time for the next target contest. Then they amazed everybody. They outshot their National Guard competitors; they outshot the Regulars. Then inquiries were made and, with Ohio generosity, the guardsmen from that State furnished shells to the Regulars whom they had beaten. Immediately the skilled marksmanship of the Regulars was proven anew. The equality of equipment made a new mark, and more important than that, there was a shake-up in the Government powder plant and Government shell making of which there is no official record, but which developed an improvement that was vital to the efficiency of American arms.

This is a poor time, Mr. President, to risk the development of Government armor-plate making when we mean to expend hundreds of millions on superdreadnaughts and battle cruisers, and want them not only the best but want them without delay. The hearings do not reveal a reliable source of armor supply if this Congress votes to take this step toward Government monopoly in armor manufacture. If the pending measure contemplated the purchase of an established plant or plants, with furnaces and forges ready for the great ingots, with a ready force of trained workmen and skilled specialists for this highly specialized work, we might have less concern. But this measure is designed to put the private factories out of business.

I have listened to the debate very carefully, and in one or two instances, in support of this administrative measure, there has been an apologetic attitude, a contention that it is designed only to create Government competition; but those of you who have followed the debate closely will find a spirit of determination to put these great armor makers out of business. There is a spirit of punitive legislation involved. I want to say in this connection that, while I favor punitive expeditions, I am opposed to punitive legislation. I had rather be in the attitude of encouraging great industry. In the hearings there developed a species of rejoicing that what is called private greed is to be put out of business. If that purpose succeeds we shall be without our source of private supply and no Government creation to take up the work.

I have listened to the suggestions made that there is business for these three participants in Government armor orders for the next five years. I can only speak for myself, Senators, but if I had capital invested in a great enterprise and saw going into the business this great Government, with its limitless resources, in view of the present attitude of the party in power in this country, I would discontinue the private enterprise tomorrow. I do not hesitate to say that if the makers of armor plate put up the price after the passage of such a bill as this they would, in the minds of the American people, be justified in putting it up. No one could blame the private producers for adopting a course of dismantling and turning their plant to other production. It would require a loftier consideration to maintain idle plants to serve an unfriendly Government in emergency than the Government spokesmen have sometimes shown for private industry in the hearings on this important question. Knowing that the great powers of Europe have encouraged private enterprise in armor making, and very wisely, as the great war has proven, it appears to me little less than the height of folly to abandon our encouragement in this important day. But this measure is aimed to do more—it is designed to put them out of business. Not to all thinking minds supporting the Government venture, perhaps, for I note that Admiral Strauss says, "I think it would be well for the Government to have competition." But it is inconceivable to me that any sane private producer will think of attempting to compete with the Federal Government in a product where that Government is the only consumer, and Government capital counts neither profit nor loss, and so many Government spokesmen rate profit as synonymous with greed. There are laws to regulate private enterprise which no Congress can repeal. Plants representing private capital can not lie idle, nor can they long be maintained without profit, no matter what Congress may choose to say on that question. We may invest public funds as no private capital would dare give a moment's thought. We may conduct Federal enterprises at a loss and an easy contempt for delays or unmet specifications, for the public seldom knows of either. Our capital is uncounted and our credit unlimited, and our stockholders—the American people—pay in and do not expect cash return. There have been ten thousand blunders, but seldom is one recited.

Perhaps I may relate one that is timely. There were newspaper accounts relating the failure of the machine guns at Columbus, N. Mex., where the Mexican outlaws made the surprise attack on that village and the Army camp, which has since sped our armed forces in pursuit of Villa.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HARDING. I do.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator state as a fact that there was a failure of the guns at Columbus to work?

Mr. HARDING. I have just said, if the Senator from Missouri will allow me, that there were newspaper reports to that effect.

Mr. REED. I saw a statement in a paper—the only one I did see—that some private had said the guns did not work. There was no evidence to substantiate the statement.

Mr. HARDING. I assure the Senator that I was careful not to say the newspaper reports settled it. What I may add may interest him, although it is not highly important. These accounts said the machine guns would not work when the great need came. I am told by very reliable authority, I believe, that the machine guns which failed were of Federal adoption and manufacture, displacing similar arms of private production, with which we had experimented, as we propose to do now, and these guns which failed have since been superseded by more dependable weapons. These costly experiments are seldom recited to the great American Republic.

In passing, it may not be uninteresting to have me say that the judgment of Federal Army and Navy experts is not so dependable in these important matters as that of efficient specialists in their respective lines. I suppose many of you are familiar with the fact that some years ago a resident of this Capital City invented what is known as the Gathmann gun. A Senator from my own State persuaded Congress to appropriate $50,000 for the manufacture and testing of that gun. It is related that it stood a most exceptional test, and the board which had the matter in hand made a report to that effect, but added that indefinite phrase, "but we are doubtful about its adoption." This expenditure had been made. The discouraged inventor went to the late Senator from Ohio who had encouraged him, and asked him what course he should pursue. Mr. Hanna said, "You have done your share. You have done all that a patriot could. You have submitted the product of your genius and it has been proven. If this Government is no longer interested in you, take your invention to a foreign power." And it is a matter of current history, Senators, that the amplified invention of that resident of the city of Washington is the pattern of the great guns employed by Germany to-day in making obsolete all the defense fortifications of the past and enables the central powers to hold the allies at bay.

It is not important, but I venture to offer it in passing, to say that sometimes we get the most effective development from those who are outside the Government forces employed in this line of work.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I did not quite understand whether the Senator said the Gatling gun or the Gathmann gun.

Mr. HARDING. The Gathmann gun.

The thought I am trying to emphasize is that the present is a poor time to discourage or discredit such American activities in private pursuit as we must rely upon not only in great crucial moments but whose heartiest cooperation we need just now in preparing for naval defense. Our matchless wealth does not make us able to ignore the experiences of the Old World nor wise to attempt it, because our very wealth is the direct result of the incomparable development of private enterprise.

Mr. President, I prefer the judgment of Admiral Strauss, who testified, "There is no advantage to the Government to establish this costly plant if the price of the private producer is fairly right," and I prefer the spirit of encouraged private enterprise to its deliberate destruction. I prefer to rely for our needs in armor on the great captains of the steel industry, who have been schooled amid the triumph of American iron and steel, than the captains and admirals of the Navy, who have been trained for war. I prefer the dependable industry of business and its specialized toilers to the bureaucratic paternalized industry which wastes the public funds and adds to the flow of the political waters.

There is one more thought I very much wish to add, more concerned with the prosperity of peace than preparedness for war. We have heard not a little lately about policies which shall destroy no American industry. I think the sober thought of the country favors giving business a square deal. It was once popular to bait big business, without an inquiry as to the conscience that must run true in every permanently successful enterprise, but the reflective judgment to-day favors giving business its fair chance. The enactment of this measure is a declared policy to kill the very enterprise that the Government asked for and encouraged. It is an added step toward Government occupation of the field of private enterprise, which made us what we are. It is a menace to our greater development in peace, and it may prove a dangerous experiment amid the pressing needs of preparedness for war.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a moment ago I ventured to interrupt the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to ask him if he vouched for the statement that the machine guns on the Mexican border at Columbus had failed to work, and if he vouched for the further statement that these Government-manufactured guns have since been superseded by the Government. It developed that the Senator was trusting to a newspaper account. It also developed that the newspaper account was based upon the statement of one man, or the alleged statement of one man, a private. Since that colloquy I have telephoned the Secretary of War, who informs me that the machine guns worked perfectly; that there was no trouble whatever with the guns, but that in the dark and in the haste the men handling the gun did not get the ammunition in just right, and there was a little trouble on that account.

So much for that illustration of the bad workmanship in Government plants.

It is astonishing how readily special pleaders for private monopoly can seize upon a single failure by a Government or a municipality, and entirely overlook the failures of the captains of industry.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I yield; certainly.

Mr. HARDING. I had no desire to magnify the incident I related, and I only did it to show that the judgment of naval and Army experts is not infallible; but if the Senator from Missouri desires to enlarge upon that particular incident, I beg to remind him that the type of guns to which I referred, which were adopted on the recommendation of the Army and Navy officers, has been entirely abandoned.

Mr. REED. And others adopted in their place. And if that has taken place, what of it? In the course of time every sort of machine that is the best of its day is abandoned for a new and improved machine; all of which only demonstrates that the Army and Navy keep up with the progress of the times. But I was commenting on the fact that it is so easy for certain gentlemen to find a difficulty and to magnify it if the Government has done anything, but that when private individuals, especially the much-loved captains of industry, are in command, all of their mistakes and shortcomings are speedily forgotten.

My distinguished friend from Ohio commented on the fact that some expert shots engaged in shooting matches with Army officers discovered somewhere a kind of powder a little superior to that used by the Regular Army officers, and that the Regular Army officers got their powder from a Government factory, and he uses that to illustrate the inferiority of Government manufacture. I might remark, in the first place, that it is always true that if you will pay any price whatsoever for an article that is manufactured for a special occasion you can generally get something a little better than the ordinary commercial article; but I remark, in the second place, that the distinguished Senator entirely overlooks not the incident of a few men shooting at a mark out in a field, but the great fact that confronted us when war was upon us, when we were trusting entirely to the private manufacturers of powder, and when the American Navy, supplied by those powder manufacturers in the Spanish War did not have a pound of smokeless powder, but went out with the old black powder that had for many years been abandoned by every first-class nation of the world.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I do; but I can not yield very often, for the clock admonishes that the time fixed to vote will arrive very soon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator know that every soldier of the Regular Army in the Spanish War used smokeless powder in his rifle?

Mr. REED. I know that. I was speaking of the artillery. Our artillery powder was black powder. I know that we got that inferior black powder from the captains of industry, and I know that the captains of the Navy would have liked to have the smokeless powder, and I know that when we built our own factories we got smokeless powder, and we got it at a reduced price.

The Senator states that he prefers the captains of industry to the captains of the Army and Navy. That depends, of course, upon the man's viewpoint. It depends, of course, upon a man's disposition. It depends, of course, upon a man's school of thought. There are no doubt plenty of men in this world who prefer to enjoy the good graces and the support of captains of industry to having the confidence of the men who must defend this Nation in the hour of its peril; but I am a little curious to know why the welfare of a captain of industry should be preferred to the safety of a captain of our Army or Navy. My curiosity is accentuated by the fact that the chief institution that makes armor plate is the United States Steel Corporation, through its subsidiaries, and that the captain of industry who is still at the head of that concern is the same captain of industry who was in command at the time when the investigation was had to which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] called attention on yesterday. The result of the investigation is thus stated in the report:

> It has been conclusively shown that the inspectors have been satisfied, and the armor plates passed by the most notorious frauds. The efforts of the company, and of its superintendents, Cline, Corey, and Schwab, have been to satisfy your committee that the armor is up to the requirements of the contract, notwithstanding the false reports to inspectors, doctoring of specimens, plugging of plates, fraudulent re-treating of test plates, and "jockeying" of the testing machine. The unblushing character of the frauds to which these men have been parties, and the disregard of truth and honesty which they have shown in testifying before your committee render them unworthy of credence.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator what report that is?

Mr. REED. I will give the Senator the year. It is the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs submitted August 23, 1894, and the selection I read is found on page 17.

Any man has the full right, as an American Senator, to stand in his place and to say that he prefers that kind of a captain of industry to a captain of the Navy of the United States. It is a constitutional privilege that ought not to be taken away from him.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. HARDING. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that I made no such statement. I have not had occasion in the course of this debate to go back through the records of the country to hunt out some criminal captain of industry. There are, of course, such men; but I make the statement, and I challenge its contradiction, that there runs through the ranks of the great captains of American industry as high a type of conscience as can be found even on the floor of the United States Senate.

Mr. REED. The Senator and I need not quarrel about that. The particular captain of industry who is to be trusted in this particular case is the head of the Steel Trust—the same captain of industry who is characterized in this report in the manner and form set forth in the report.

I do not know what particular captains of industry the Senator refers to as so highly honorable. I am making no attack upon a man because he has money, but I am saying that when this country comes to the hard grip of war I will prefer putting my confidence in the Army and Navy of the United States, composed of Regulars and Volunteers, and its captains, than to put it in the gentlemen who advise us that if we dare establish an armor-plate factory they will raise the price on us $200. If they dare do that in a time of profound peace, when we are just beginning to make preparations for an emergency which may confront us—if they are that kind of patriotic citizens, I want to have the Government in a position where it does not have to rely upon them in time of war.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio made another statement. He said that the gentlemen running the armor-plate factories had the right to retain the secrets of their profits. I grant you that any man running a private busines has a right to retain the secrets of his profits, but if a man refuses to disclose his profits it follows that the profits are so large that he does not want to lay the facts before the public. If the profits had been small there would have been no request that the Secretary of the Treasury should keep the fact silent. I am wondering, however, what becomes of that argument when you lay it alongside of another argument we have been having, which, in effect, is that these gentlemen who keep their profits secret do not make any profits. In one breath gentlemen tell us that they make no profits at all——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. In the next breath they tell us that the profits should be kept secret. Certainly both of those statements can not be accurate.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just one moment.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question just there.

Mr. REED. Just wait until I conclude my statement on this point, and I will yield. I call attention, further, to the fact that the same gentlemen who made this argument in favor of this monopoly tell us that the way we are to know whether we are getting reasonable prices or not is to compare the prices we pay with the prices paid by other Governments, but almost at the same moment another special advocate of the armor-plate monopoly tells us that all other Governments pay excessive prices. So that we are asked to satisfy ourselves that our prices are fair by comparing them with other prices, which these gentlemen admit are excessive, and thereupon to be content if we are not robbed quite as badly as other Governments. That is the kind of argument we have been listening to all day.

Mr. OLIVER. We are listening to a little of it now, Mr. President. The Senator says that it is claimed here that these people are working without profit. I challenge the Senator right here to show where, in any part of this record, in the hearings, or in the argument of the case, that claim has been made.

Mr. REED. Oh, the claim was substantially made that their profits were very small.

Mr. OLIVER. That word "substantially" is a very fine word—a very good word.

Mr. REED. It is not difficult to understand why gentlemen should get excited over this question—not at all difficult. There is not anything remarkable about it. I remember asking the Senator the question whether it was true that the Bethlehem Co. was a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation, and he admitted it was. I want to read the Senate some testimony:

> I own 1,000 shares of the preferred stock of the United States Steel Corporation. I do not regard that ownership as being menaced in any way by this proposed legislation—

That is, the tariff legislation.

I am reading from the testimony given before the lobby investigating committee by the Senator from Pennsylvania, who just interrupted me.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the Senator well knows that the argument ad hominem is about as weak an argument as can be presented on behalf of any case, and the fact that he has presented it shows how weak his case is now.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, there is an old line which may be paraphrased so that it will run—

How sweet the watch dog's honest bark
Loud baying when we draw near home.

[Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The occupants of the galleries are again admonished that they must not show approval or disapproval of the proceedings on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. REED. I say, since the Senator wants to make it pointed, that if I owned $117,000 worth of the stock of any company engaged in Government contracts I would not plead for a continuance of those contracts.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I think, as a matter of personal privilege, I have a right to say something here.

Mr. REED. Not in my time.

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator wants to crowd me out on a question of personal privilege——

Mr. REED. I do not object, if I can have the time deducted from the three minutes that elapse between now and 4 o'clock, when, as all know, the gavel will fall, and we must proceed to vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not deducting time. It is not the Chair's business.

Mr. REED. There will be plenty of time for the Senator to make reply before the debate closes.

Mr. President, there was something said here this morning about demagogues. Whenever a man dares say anything in favor of lifting a burden from the back of the American people he is, in the minds of certain gentlemen, a demagogue. It does not make any difference what that appeal may be; he is a demagogue.

Of course I can understand why a Senator who thinks that the opinion of a captain of industry is to be preferred over that of a captain in the Army and Navy on matters relating to the national defense should also entertain the opinion that any man who proposes to do anything for the purpose of enabling this Government to escape from the grip of a monopoly is a demagogue. I for one count it an honor to be classed as that sort of a demagogue who believes in protecting this Government against and its people from the exactions of monopoly. I count it as a credit to be classed as that sort of a demagogue who, when he finds that three concerns who are called upon to bid for public work come with bids which tally to the exact cent, has sense enough to know that there has been a combination between those bidders; and I count it as a thing not to be ashamed of that I have read enough law to know that when men bid that way they are guilty of a fraud denounced by every writer on the law and by every authority upon equity, and yet I am not astounded to find the monopolies which have perpetrated such frauds on our Government have their stout defenders upon the other side of this Chamber.

My time has elapsed and I am compelled to close, although I have barely touched upon the monstrous pleas in behalf of the monopoly which has so long plundered the Government of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into, the Senate will now proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition. The bill has been amended as in Committee of the Whole and will now be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, and would inquire of the Chair whether the offering of such an amendment is in order at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair believes that it is now in order, the bill being in the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to offer the following amendment, and ask that the Secretary may read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 13, after the semicolon following the word "armor," insert:

To be located at a place or places approved by the General Board of the Navy, with especial reference to considerations of safety in time of war.

So that if amended it will read:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to provide, either by the erection of a factory or by the purchase of a factory, or both, for the manufacture of armor for the vessels of the Navy; said factory or factories to have an annual capacity of not less than 20,000 tons of armor, to be located at a place or places approved by the General Board of the Navy, with especial reference to considerations of safety in time of war; and the sum of $11,000,000 is hereby appropriated—

And so forth.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, Senators, I think, will immediately see that the amendment is exceedingly simple and speaks for itself. In listening to the discussion which has taken place upon the bill it has become more and more apparent to me that the thought lives in the minds of a number of Senators that if the bill shall pass and the Government erect an armor-plate factory it will be but the beginning, if they have their way, of the establishment of a general policy on the part of the Government looking to the manufacture by the Government of the United States of all its munitions of war. That thought has been uttered on more than one occasion in the debate upon the merits of the bill itself.

In view of the tendency of this measure and that thought which is in the mind of a good many Senators, it occurred to me that if such a policy was to be embarked upon the Congress of the United States should set forth in the first statute which marks the beginning of such a policy, a policy which has especial importance with respect to the national defense.

In this connection I may comment very briefly upon the situation of the country with respect to munition plants. I have not the figures at hand, but I think I shall not be contradicted in the statement when I say that a very large proportion of all the manufacturing establishments in the United States upon which this country will have to rely in time of war to furnish it with the weapons with which to fight are situated upon the Atlantic coast east of the Appalachian Mountains. That is true not only with respect to private plants, but also Government plants. There is a Government arsenal at Watertown, in Massachusetts, at a point which might be reached by an expeditionary raiding force and by such a force destroyed. All the rifles of the United States Army are made at Springfield, Mass., conceivably within the reach of a hostile expeditionary force. A vast industry in the manufacture of munitions in private hands has grown up at New Haven and Bridgeport, upon Long Island Sound. Every one of those places is vulnerable in the highest degree.

There is an Army arsenal at Philadelphia, the Frankford Arsenal, which manufactures some of the equipment of the Army. That, in the judgment of any military expert, is also a vulnerable point. There is a powder plant engaged in the making of powder for the Army at a point in New Jersey, also a vulnerable point, so far as a hostile expeditionary force is concerned. The Navy has a powder plant at Indianhead, also a vulnerable point. All the guns of the Navy are made here at Washington, and history has shown that Washington is a vulnerable point. It was once captured by a force of 2,000 expeditionary soldiers.

The object of this amendment must be perfectly plain. It is that in the event the Government embarks upon the policy of manufacturing its own weapons, Congress shall declare it as a policy that the location of these plants shall be left to the expert judgment of the men who have made a study of tactics and strategy and the possibilities of our situation in a military sense.

It is therefore my desire and hope, Mr. President, that in this respect, at least, if this bill is bound to pass—and I very much regret it if it will—that the location of this plant be left with the General Board of the Navy, that it shall be with especial consideration to the elements of safety in time of war.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator from New York and for the committee I accept the amendment so far as I am allowed to do so.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am well aware that military authorities, so far as they have expressed themselves, concur generally in the view of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I am informed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that the chairman of the Naval Committee has accepted the amendment. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think the Senator from South Carolina can accept it. It must be put to a vote of the Senate.

Mr. PHELAN. I desire, therefore, simply to enter this protest at this time that it is a debatable question whether all the munition factories should be located in the interior of the country for military and strategic reasons. I do not know why the policy of the Government, without debate here, should be emphasized at this time concerning the location of munition plants; and, certainly, the armor-plate plant can not be in the same category, subject to the same objections, as a plant for the manufacture of powder or small arms, because if we were in the condition of being invaded and an expeditionary force did destroy the armor-plate plant—inasmuch as the use of armor is solely for the construction of warships—the interruption would be of no consequence. If we were not in a position at that moment to repel the foe, we would not be in any better position were we able to preserve our armor-plate establishment.

If the enemy can come upon our shores, cutting its way through the first line and principal defense, the Navy of the United States, then, indeed, all our property, all our manufacturing plants, mostly located upon the eastern seaboard, whether public or private, would be exposed to destruction.

Our simple duty is to prepare our Government with efficient ships and men, on sea and shore, to make invasion an absolute impossibility, because in that lies our only security.

On the Pacific coast there has been for 60 years a Government arsenal, at Benecia, a point 40 miles north of San Francisco at the head of the navigation of the San Francisco Bay, most eligibly located, where the two great rivers, the Sacramento and the San Joaquin, debouch into the bay. There are hard by pipe lines carrying oil, there are smelting works of the first importance; and yet it has been intimated, following necessarily from the argument of the Senator from New York, that a site of 300 acres owned by the Government, far from the range of any guns mounted upon any ship at sea, the limit of which range is about 25,000 yards, should be rendered by the adoption of such an amendment as unfit for further service.

I contend that the wonderful facilities enjoyed by such a plant can not be set aside by fear of invasion. If a landing party comes upon our coasts and destroys that arsenal, then, as I have said before, our country is, indeed, imperiled, and every private interest as well as every public interest is exposed to destruction. If that plant supplying the necessary munitions of war is located beyond the Appalachian or beyond the Sierras we would have a still more difficult problem to contend with—of getting munitions to the battle front, because doubtless most military and all naval action will be on the coast. An enemy could destroy the railway passes and bridges beyond immediate repair and leave our forces without the means of defense. It is easier to defend a plant than to protect the mountain passes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from California has expired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I do not know that I altogether caught the purport of the amendment, but does it deal with the possibility that the Government may purchase rather than construct a plant? Under the provisions of the original bill it was contemplated that perhaps the Government might purchase a plant.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The amendment makes no change in that respect, I will say to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course, if the Government should purchase an existing plant, it could not give anybody the right to locate it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The amendment simply provides that in any plant erected by the Government or purchased by the Government, the situation shall be approved by the General Board of the Navy.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator understands that there would be no choice if it comes to the question of purchasing a plant. There are only three plants in existence.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. For his information I will state, if the Government bought one of these plants they would have to take it up and move it away. I think it is generally conceded, at least that was the testimony before the Naval Committee—I can not lay my hand on it in the brief time I have—that the purchase would involve the removal of some sites selected by the Government; that it would not be practical to run the Government plant in conjunction with the vast establishments engaged in the general business. That was the testimony before the committee anyhow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Please let the Secretary read the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the original print of the bill, page 2, line 13, after the word "armor" and the semicolon, insert the words:

To be located at a place or places approved by the General Board of the Navy, with especial reference to considerations of safety in time of war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I send a substitute to the desk, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Navy shall enter into negotiations with those who are now equipped to manufacture armor plate and shall, if possible, make an agreement with them, severally, which shall, in effect, apportion among them the requirements of the Government for a period not to exceed five years in proportion to their respective capacities, the price to be paid for armor plate thus contracted for to be the cost of manufacture, including all items which are ordinarily charged to a manufacturing business of a similar character under a scientific system of accounting, which shall include interest actually paid upon money borrowed, and to which shall be added 6 per cent per annum upon the capital employed in the business, including the replacement value of so much of the plants as are applicable to this production, less any bonded or other indebtedness thereon.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the purpose of the substitute which I offer is to take advantage of the capital which is now invested in this industry and not add to that capital, when it is apparent that there is quite sufficient now in order to produce all the armor plate which the Government may need.

Let me recall to the Senate the real facts in this case. There has been $30,000,000, in round numbers, first and last, put into these plants. The replacement value is said to be about $25,000,000. I think the plants are carried on the books of the companies at about $20,000,000. They have a combined capacity of about 30,000 tons of armor annually. The needs of the Government have only been in the past an average of about 12,000 tons a year. So they have only been worked at two-fifths of their capacity. Even under the proposed plans of the Government there will not be over 24,000 tons a year, so that the 30,000 tons' capacity is ample to provide for all the armor which the Government may need.

There is another reason for not destroying these plants. If they are destroyed, and the Government is the sole manufacturer of armor, our possibility of selling to European and South American countries at once disappears. We have already sold some armor to Russia, a little, I believe, to Italy, and we provided the armor used in the construction of a battleship built for the Argentine Government at the Fore River Works.

There are great possibilities in connection with this industry for manufacturing armor for other countries, and especially those in South America, in case our arrangements for developing our trade with South America mature. Therefore, if we are going to construct this armor at a Government plant, we shall at once lose all possibility of furnishing other countries with that product.

That is another reason why we should not destroy these plants. Why should we invest ten or eleven or twelve or fifteen million dollars, from the standpoint of the American people, in another armor plant when there is capital enough already invested in this business for the purposes of the Government under any circumstances?

I suggested the other day in some remarks which I submitted to the Senate that it seemed to me the proper way to do would be for the Secretary of the Navy to enter into a contract with these manufacturers, they agreeing to supply a maximum amount of armor, the Government agreeing to take a minimum amount at a fixed price, that price to be based upon the actual cost of manufacture plus 6 per cent on the amount of money involved in the business. How could there be a fairer proposition than the actual cost of manufacture plus 6 per cent on the cost of manufacture? Any proposition which votes down that demand is simply a proposition to confiscate the property which now exists and to substitute some other in its place.

I do not believe that Senators, when they come to consider that proposition, will want to establish the precedent of putting the Government into business in competition with its own citizens and at the same time involving in the manufacture connected with that business an amount of capital which is unnecessary for the purposes of government.

Mr. STONE. Before the Senator from Massachusetts sits down, I should like to ask him this question: If the establishment of a Government armor plant would have the effect of closing the armor plants now in operation, so that the Government would be the sole manufacturer of armor in the United States, would there be any objection, constitutional or otherwise, to the Government in time of peace selling armor to another nation?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think there would be any constitutional objection, Mr. President; but I have not any idea that any other nation would purchase armor manufactured by a plant run by a rival Government. That would be an unheard of procedure, so far as I know, in connection with military supplies.

Mr. STONE. We do sell them guns and battleships.

Mr. WEEKS. But those are constructed by private concerns, and not at a Government plant.

Mr. STONE. But we also sell them guns which we own. That has been done by the Government.

Mr. WEEKS. We have never sold any guns to foreign nations except the guns that were on two battleships, which we sold to the Greek Nation last year.

Mr. STONE. We have sold them battleships which we have owned.

Mr. WEEKS. We sold two battleships which we owned to a small country in Europe; but I do not know of any other instance where one country has purchased, especially new supplies of munitions or arms, of another country where they were manufactured in a government plant.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. The Chair desires to intervene here. The Chair is under an order to limit the time of each Senator in debate to five minutes.

Mr. WEEKS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he can ask the question in his own time, and I can answer it in his time.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not intend to discuss the question at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is going to rule from this time forward that when a Senator yields to a question the time consumed shall be taken out of his five minutes.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well. Assuming that the substitute proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] were adopted and became the law, what assurance has the Senator from Massachusetts that the propositon would be accepted by these three armor-plate factories which are now in existence?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have not any other assurance than that of an article which I saw in a newspaper this morning, which I shall not take the time to read, but which seemed to me a sufficient basis for preparing the substitute which I have sent to the desk.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I will say that the testimony shows that if the manufacturers of armor plate had invested their money in 4 per cent bonds when they constructed their plants they would be better off than they now are. That being the case, I assume, of course, that they would be willing to accept a proposition which would pay them 6 per cent on their investment.

Mr. POMERENE. That is one of the statements which we are expected to accept on faith, without any investigation.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator from Ohio has all the information I have on that point. It is sworn testimony.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it is my intention to vote for the bill as amended on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I believe that it is good business for this Government to engage, in part, in the manufacture of all the necessary supplies for its administration and of munitions and implements for defense. By so doing it will have the opportunity and the power to equalize prices and to prevent those combinations against it which are inevitably made in these modern business times, and which, of course, are made for the purpose of dictating and fixing prices to the consumer—governmental and otherwise. Certainly that practice will be modified and beneficially influenced by a Government which has the power, by partial manufacture, to influence the operation of such possible combinations against it.

I shall support the bill also because I believe that the present situation has been largely responsible for a one-sided development of our Navy, by which I mean a preponderance of armored vessels as compared with others equally necessary for a well-balanced fleet. It is history that when under the administration of President Roosevelt our fleet of battleships went around the world the Government was obliged to hire 52 transports—I think that was the number—from foreign countries to accompany the fleet because of the lack of sufficient transport supplies of our own. In the event war had been declared by any other nation upon ours or by ours upon any other nation during the absence of our fleet, the strange anomaly would have been presented of a fleet of battleships away from home with 52 transports every one of which would have belonged to a belligerent or to a neutral. The effect of such a situation upon our naval arm can be easily imagined.

This condition must be remedied if we are to have a well-balanced Navy. It will most likely be remedied if this influence, which unquestionably makes tremendous profits out of the supply of armor to the Government of the United States, is modified in the manner which this bill proposes.

Nor have I any fear whatever, Mr. President, that either of these institutions will go out of business, as some Senators so seriously apprehend. If it be true that they are manufacturing armor more cheaply than any other institution of the sort in the world, then it is equally true that unless they are in combination with foreign manufacturers of armor, by which they are excluded from other countries, they will undoubtedly command the markets of the world. The inevitable operation of the law of supply and demand will surely produce that consequence. To say, therefore, that three great institutions, capable to-day, notwithstanding the supposed handicap of higher labor and more expensive material, of producing armor cheaper than any other institution in the world, will go out of business because the Government proposes to manufacture armor plate of its own is to make a statement that is overthrown by the common business experience of every man in the country. But, Mr. President, I think there is no question that such a combination exists and has existed for some time. And the effect of this bill will be to undermine it.

I shall ask leave to insert as a part of my remarks and bearing upon this subject an article by David Starr Jordan upon the subject of "War trusts," which was inspired by the exposé of Dr. Liebknecht in the German Reichstag, in April, 1912, of the Krupp Munitions Trust.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The article referred to is as follows:

WAR TRUSTS.

[By David Starr Jordan.]

Under the head of "The war traders," Mr. George H. Perris, of London, has given a very interesting analysis of the interlocking-directorate system, as applied to the most greedy and dangerous of all corporations—those who deal in the munitions of war.

He shows that the several British firms are for the most part not real competitors, but joined in a general trust, and that this trust is by no means confined to one country. The scandals in the case of the Krupp Co. and the Deutsche Waffens & Munitions Fabrik have their parallels in every country. The Nobel Dynamite Trust affords an illustration of the "cosmopolitan character which the modern war trade is assuming." "This British company, with its capital of £3,285,400, its net profits for 1911–12 of £3,819,000, and its regular 10 per cent dividends, is a shareholding rather than a manufacturing concern. It is, in brief, an Anglo-German dynamite alliance." It holds the entire capital of the Nobel Explosive Co. (Ltd.), and it has large holdings in the British South African Explosive Co., the Birmingham Metal & Munitions Co., the Chilworth Gunpowder Co., as well as in the Dynamite Actien Gesellschaft, of Hamburg, the Dresdner Dynamit Fabrik, and two other German firms.

With the extension of the great navies, the smaller nations have patriotically established armor-plate industries and shipbuilding of their own, but this is only in appearance. Most or all of these in Russia, in Canada, in Spain, in Portugal, in Italy, in Japan are but tentacles of the great British trust, the subsidiary being formed by the Vickers, Armstrongs, and Browns to meet the feelings of the people they rob or serve. "Time was when England bled for Portugal; now our old ally must bleed for us."

A most remarkable combination is that of the Harvey United Steel Co. "Although a dividend of 7½ per cent had been paid in 1911, it was decided last year to wind the concern up. Why, it does not appear. The managing director was Mr. Albert Vickers, chairman of Vickers (Ltd.), with a holding of 2,697 shares. Other directors were Mr. Beardmore, of William Beardmore & Co., Mr. J. M. Falkner, of Armstrong-Whitworth, and Mr. C. E. Ellis, with a holding of 7,438 shares, representing John Brown & Co., Coventry Co., and Thomas Firth & Co. The chief American partner was the Bethlehem Steel Co., holding 4,301 shares. The chief French partner was the Schneider Co., with 9,862 shares. The combine had four French directors; two of these held 2,000 shares each. This did not in any way prevent the collaboration of the two German armament firms condemned in the Reichstag by Herr Liebknecht—the Essen Co., holding 4,731 shares, and having two representatives on the board, and the Ellilinen Co., having one representative and holding 2,731 shares. Finally the Italian Terne Steel Co. held 8,000 shares. Behind the managers stood the bankers, the same extraordinary amity prevailing. The house of Ernest Ruffer, with 6,169 shares, linked hands with the Bougeres Frères of Paris (3,000) on the one side and the Deutsche Bank of Berlin (1,350) on the other.

"In 40 years all the peace societies have not succeeded in effecting such a Franco-German reconciliation as this. In the share list Mr. Newbold found the names of one British general and two major generals, and behind these were the shadowy figures of a vast host of princes, peers, ministers of the crown, soldiers, sailors, and clerics. A veritable brotherhood in arms. I can not believe that the Harvey United Steel Co. was really dead. Somewhere it has surely had a glorious resurrection. It surely lives and works to prove the pettiness of national prejudice, with ease of forgetting such sores as Alsace-Lorraine, when men have learned the golden wisdom of good business."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, we have now no competition in the manufacture of armor plate. Shortly after I came to the Senate the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] addressed this body concerning that subject and called attention to the fact that, instead of competition in the furnishing of this very necessary article to the Government, those representing these three great institutions were accustomed, when the occasions arose, to come to this city together, to go to the same hotel, and from their rooms submit identical bids for each plant to the Government for the armor needed for ships about to be constructed.

That practice, Mr. President, I hope and believe will disappear when this bill has become a law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, while I have drafted an amendment very similar to the one introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts, as that may possibly be adopted, I will direct my remarks to that particular amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Senate. After speaking for five minutes,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

[Mr. McCUMBER's remarks will be found on page 4546.]

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is this amendment offered as a substitute for the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. PITTMAN. In other words, the adoption of this amendment, as I understand, will absolutely destroy this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. It will improve it.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes to instruct the Secretary of the Navy to divide the 24,000-ton program for this year between the three plants. If he were not instructed, where would he obtain the armor except from these three plants? No two of the plants has sufficient capacity to make the 24,000 tons required under the program for this year. Consequently, the Secretary of the Navy would be compelled to go to those plants, and to all of them, unless he went abroad, to obtain this armor. Then, why does the Senator desire to instruct the Secretary to enter into negotiations, unless——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Just a second, please—unless the latter part of that amendment has a meaning which is not apparent on its face. He states that the Secretary shall enter into a contract, which shall take into consideration all of the costs which are generally considered as costs in such enterprises. What does that include? All manufacturing costs are only $262 a ton, while the costs, including management, are $315 a ton, running at full capacity. The general expenses include salaries of presidents, vice presidents, secretaries, and treasurers, and they include pay to those officers as bonuses. The Senator from Massachusetts desires this body to instruct the Secretary of the Navy to do what? To enter into a contract which will take into consideration the highest salaries of those officers and those bonuses. That is the only object that I can see in the amendment, because if that amendment has not the purpose of tying the Secretary's hands to an unconscionable contract, then no amendment is needed, because in the nature of things he would have to go to those very people to buy. I contend that the object of this amendment, apparently, is not only to destroy this bill, but it is to compel the Secretary of the Navy to enter into a contract on a basis which we consider unconscionable.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator believes that the Government is paying more for armor than is necessary, does he not?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. Does the Senator object to the Government paying the actual cost of manufacture and 6 per cent on the capital involved?

Mr. PITTMAN. Not the actual cost of manufacture.

Mr. WEEKS. The amendment provides——

Mr. PITTMAN. But I object to the amendment, which includes the cost—general expenses—which embrace the high salaries of officers, which this Government would not have to pay if it were manufacturing its own product.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the amendment provides that the cost shall be ascertained as is usually done in matters relating to similar manufacturing.

Mr. PITTMAN. But the managers of those plants, in giving to the committee the costs, have not only included the actual manufacturing costs, but they have included what they term "general expenses." Those general expenses, according to the testimony of those witnesses, include the salaries of officers and the expenses of those officers in obtaining contracts. The facts concerning how much those salaries were and what those bonuses were we were unable to obtain.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the amendment provides that expert public accountants shall determine what the costs are, and then 6 per cent interest shall be added to those costs.

Mr. PITTMAN. They shall determine what the costs are in accordance with this amendment, which requires them to take into consideration general expenses,

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it requires nothing that is unusual in connection with a manufacturing business similar to the manufacture of armor plate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; but——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Nevada has expired.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the trouble with the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is that it comes too late. For 18 years Congress has been endeavoring to secure from the armor-plate manufacturer of the United States armor at a fair cost. One year, as I recall, we fixed the price in the law, and the armor-plate factories refused to bid. In another year—1900—we adopted a proviso in the naval appropriation bill authorizing an additional appropriation of $4,000,000 for the construction of an armor-plate factory, that sum to be used by the Secretary of the Navy in case satisfactory contracts could not be made. The Secretary of the Navy considered the contracts satisfactory, and yet the fact is that the prices for armor charged after that proviso was inserted were greater than they had been before that time.

Mr. President, I want to refer to a statement—it seemed to me a very reckless statement—made this afternoon by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. As he closed his remarks, he said:

> Every year the cost of armor plate has been added to by legislation in Congress. The eight-hour law imposed great burdens on the manufacturer of this article. Wages have been steadily going up ever since the art was first instituted and established in the United States; and yet, notwithstanding all that, the price has been steadily going down until the last figure was $425 a ton.

That statement I must characterize as a reckless one, because since the year 1896 there have been only two years in which the prices charged by the Bethlehem Steel Co. were higher than the price they charged during the last year. For many years the price ranged from $400 to $420 per ton; and only on two occasions, during the year 1913, were the prices of the Bethlehem Steel Co. above that figure.

So I say, Mr. President, the price has not been "steadily going down." The efforts of Congress to limit these prices, the efforts of Congress to procure armor under competition, the efforts of Congress to require these companies really to compete, have failed, and patience has become exhausted. Now, the time has come for the sovereignty of the United States to assert itself, and to make for itself the armor which it requires for its vessels in its program of preparedness. The amendment comes too late.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. If it is passed as a substitute for this bill, nothing will be accomplished. We have no assurance whatever that armor plate can be obtained on the conditions therein mentioned. It is a very nice way to destroy the bill. If this is substituted and the bill passes in that form, Congress will adjourn without action. Then, if it adjourns without action, this Government will still be at the mercy of this combination.

I hope those who favor the Government providing for the erection of its own plant, or the purchase of its plant—which is optional in this bill—will vote against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to speak for a few moments on this amendment. If I am not quite through when the five minutes are up, I desire to use the time that I am allowed on the bill itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can not rule in that way. The Chair would have no way of knowing when the Senator got off the amendment and on the bill.

Mr. JONES. I will very soon tell the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be obliged to hold the Senator down to five minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have had considerable trouble in making up my mind as to how I ought to vote on this bill. Under ordinary and normal conditions I would heartily support the bill and cheerfully vote for it, but if we are to have battleships we must have armor plate. Three private companies have furnished and produce now all the armor plate that is necessary. No question is made as to the quality of this armor plate. No claim is made that the existing companies can not meet the needs of the Government. It is not shown—at least, not to my satisfaction—that the price charged the Government is exorbitant. The Government by this bill proposes to go into the business and erect a plant to construct all the armor plate necessary. No matter what we may say, the result will be to drive these people out of business,

We contemplate a largely increased naval program. This may require much more armor plate; but when we decide to go into the business these companies will decide to go out. In my judgment, this is not the time to put them out of business.

A great fear has been created that we may face a great danger at or near the close of the war now raging. Because of this we are urged to increase our Army and our Navy. If we are to have trouble, we will need these armor plants. If we are not, we will lose very little, if anything, by waiting a short time. No one knows what the condition will be when the war closes. We may not then have so much need for armor plate as heretofore. We may turn to smaller naval vessels instead of great battleships. We may not deem it necessary to go into this business. We may find that we do not need this plant.

This bill is said to be an administration measure as a part of its preparedness program. I am against it in behalf of real, genuine preparedness. Pass this bill, drive these plants out of business, and you take away the very foundation from efficient naval preparedness. This is in line with your entire preparedness policy—not with your program, but with the policy that you follow. You would create an army and not supply it with guns and ammunition. You would supply ships without crews or docking facilities. You would authorize battleships without any assurance that you would get the armor with which to protect them. I may not be so strong for so-called preparedness as some others, but I am in favor of doing whatever we do fully, completely, and efficiently.

Under ordinary conditions I would be for this bill. When the war closes, when peace comes, when conditions become normal, let us then take up the matter calmly, and act advisedly, and with a due regard for the safety of the country as well as for justice to these people, who have largely been induced to go into the business by the Government itself.

Mr. President, we lose nothing by waiting until next year to decide what is wise to do in this matter. The consequences of acting now may be most disastrous as well as very expensive. For these reasons, I deem it my patriotic duty to vote against this bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I will say for myself that I am utterly opposed to the amendment proffered by the Senator from Massachusetts. I feel that I can see in it a clever method of defeating the original proposition. I am in favor of a Government-owned armor-plate factory and many other Government-owned utilities; but I feel that if there is any one thing that the Government should and could with propriety maintain and manufacture, it is with reference to arms and munitions of war. I shall support the original bill.

I want to say at the same time, Mr. President, that a few days ago, when the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] was addressing the Senate on the subject of Government ownership, I sought recognition to ask a question of the Senator as to whether he considered former Senator Beveridge an authority. "No," said he, "I do not"; and he hesitated and absolutely refused to listen, and brushed all inquiry aside. But yesterday, when the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was addressing the Senate in the same strain, and speaking of Krupp's, I ventured to interject an inquiry in what I thought a perfectly proper manner. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts brushed me away as he would a fly, saying that "everybody knows all about Krupp's"; and yet at the same time the distinguished Senator was clearly making an erroneous statement as to the question of Krupp's being a government or a private plant. I should have hesitated in my inquiry; and had I done so I would have learned that these two distinguished gentleman came from Massachusetts, from Boston, the hub of the universe, and the very center of all wisdom. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has for the second time to-day admonished the occupants of the galleries. If the rules of the Senate are not observed, the galleries will be cleared.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, perhaps it would have been better for me to have allowed a little time to intervene between the remarks of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and myself, because it appears that, as has frequently been the case, I have been thinking along the same lines that he has.

Mr. President, this is a practical question, to be settled at a time most unusual. Our Government is practically committed to an extraordinary and expensive plan of preparedness. The President has passed through the land sounding in clarion tones the dangers which he says imminently threaten. The House of Representatives is now about to vote upon an enlarged military bill. The Senate will be considering that question immediately. Both Houses agree that a large naval program must be followed. Under existing conditions, every resource of the country should be utilized. Germany during the last two years has taught the world its greatest lesson in efficient preparedness. She has mobilized both private enterprise and public resources. Any program, even the smallest proposed, if adopted, will draw heavily upon the financial ability of our Government. Taxes far in excess of any that have ever been levied upon the people will be laid. Is it wise for Congress at this time to raise by taxes $11,000,000, which, of course, everybody knows is not more than half the amount that will actually be required? The original estimate of cost was $10,000,000 for a 10,000-ton plant, and now it is proposed to double the size or capacity of the plant by this bill, and yet only a million dollars additional is added to the appropriation. Is it wise to invest this amount in an enterprise for the construction and equipment of a factory to produce armor plate, but which can not turn out a pound of that material for at least three years? Is it not wiser to utilize the industries already in existence during this time of stress and emergency and devote the people's money to efficient and speedy preparedness? Why, $11,000,000 would build a whole fleet of submarines and destroyers, and yet that amount and more is to be invested in a Government factory, while the expenditures for warcraft will not be reduced.

It is admitted that when this proposed factory is constructed the independent plants will be forced out of business. Indeed, the chairman of the committee admits that that is one of the objects of the measure. A majority of the proponents of the bill admit this. Will not this impending doom, then, affect their production between the passage of this bill and the time when the Government shall have established its own plant? Will it not properly and speedily turn to other lines of production? Is it safe for Congress, at a time when it is preparing for an emergency defense, to destroy an existing and necessary facility for that purpose?

I can not think anyone believes that the Government can produce armor plate as cheaply as it can be produced by private enterprise. But even if it were known that it could be produced more cheaply by the Government, it is not the part of wisdom for the United States to embark upon the project now. I am not convinced that the Government is paying more than it ought to pay for armor plate. There is no conclusive proof to that effect. It is, however, uncontradicted that the Government is now getting as good armor plate as is made, and at a price lower than that paid by any naval power in the world. If neither quality nor economy demand this measure, is it not the height of folly to destroy plants already equipped, and at the same time increase the present enormous public expense by at least $15,000,000, from which no returns will be possible under three years?

I do not like the history of the manufacturers of armor plate in their dealings with the United States; but that history has not been worse than the conduct of our Navy Department in its failure to secure the rights of the Government from these manufacturers. Lower prices could have been obtained than those paid, in many instances, if the department had looked after the public interests as a private citizen would have looked after his own interests. If too high prices have been paid the fault was not so much the greed of manufacturers as it was the neglect of Government officials. I will not at this time vote to enter upon any experiment which may weaken my country or impair its resources or impose additional unnecessary burdens upon the people already groaning beneath the load of extravagance and gross inefficiency.

I may be optimistic, but somehow or other I feel that out of the European war will come a world condition which will not require so much armor plate. The sentiment for peace is overspreading the civilized world. Practical disarmament may be a dream, but it must come true. Maybe it will be after this nightmare of war. It is possible that we may never have great use for this proposed plant. I hope we never shall. That question may be favorably settled before this factory can be completed. So long as the national defense can be better served under existing conditions, I believe it is wiser to wait for saner and more normal times to embark upon this experiment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I shall vote for the pending measure, but not for the reasons which have, in the main, been advanced in its behalf. I shall not vote for it in order to revenge the United States upon the existing armor-plate establishments. I shall not vote for it because I believe that the United States has paid more than it ought to have paid for armor plate in the past. It may be that the cost has been excessive, but I do not know it. I shall not vote for it in order to create competition between a plant owned by the United States and plants owned by private corporations. I shall vote for it because it is my profoundest conviction that the manufacture of armor plate for battleships is a governmental function. It is not only an appropriate governmental function, but it ought to be exclusively a governmental function; and I shall vote for it hoping that private enterprise will, in the course of time, be entirely eliminated from the business, not only in the United States but in every country in the world.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not yield, Mr. President.

I shall vote for the bill because it is my hope that sometime profit may be taken out of war so far as it is possible to take profit from human conflict.

I understand the position of my friend from Washington [Mr. JONES], and it is sound if the consequences would follow that he suggests; but they would not. Until the Government has established its plant, and is ready for the manufacture of armor plate, it is inconceivable to me that the plants now in existence will refuse to operate and refuse to produce the armor which the Government so much needs in the enlargement of its Navy. I can not conceive men so resentful against their Government as to be unwilling to operate these plants at a profit until the time comes when they can no longer operate them at a profit. I agree that looking to the speedy cessation—within five years or so—of the manufacture of armor plate in this country as a private business, we will be compelled to pay more for the plate than we otherwise would be compelled to pay. It would be just to pay more, and I am willing to pay more. Some time we must make this change, and the transition will never be easy; it will never be without obstacles; and we can make it now, when the sentiment of the whole world is aroused by the horrors of war, better than we can make it at any other time.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to what appears to be the legal effect of the amendment tendered by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. It may be that the Senator from Nevada correctly interpreted the motive of the Senator from Massachusetts, but I pay my tribute to the skilled hand of the artful master and the eminent legal attainments of the professional skilled advocate, to whom I send my congratulations and for which I express my envy.

If the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts shall be adopted it imposes upon the Secretary of the Navy the duty of contracting for all the armor plate manufactured, and that for five years the armor plate shall be bought from these makers. Thus you will have a contract that insures them five years of patronage by the Government without regard to how short a time from now, should this bill pass, the factory itself may be constructed.

It is my opinion, with great respect to the Senator, that it was his object in that amendment to insure these manufacturers that five years' security, and that all the remaining portion of the amendment was interesting matter that merely weaved its embroidery around the main point in hand.

Should we adopt the amendment that calls for the Secretary of the Navy to divide the armor-plate contracts into three parts for five years with the only three concerns making armor, they alone will furnish it, and then if in a short time we should complete the factory and succeed in equipping it and putting it in a position where we may effectually manufacture and deliver, and then the United States attempt to take the armor plate from its own factory contrary to the five-year contract, these three independent concerns could jointly or independently enjoin the United States upon the ground that this was a contract to take their armor plate for five years, and because of such that it lessened their privilege guaranteed for five years; that the taking of armor from the Government factory in violation of the contract, upon the faith of which they had continued their investments, was taking their property in violation of contract and imposing losses upon them within the five years contrary to express legislative enactment.

In support of that I call the eminent Senator's attention to the Supreme Court of the United States in a case in which I was defeated, consequently it is not unknown to me. It is one the Senator from Washington can recall, the city of Walla Walla v. the Walla Walla Waterworks (172 U. S.), beginning on page 1.

The Supreme Court of the United States there held that the contract on the part of the municipality to take its water for a certain length of time only from the private company prohibited the municipality from building its own plants and put in operation a plant at a loss of the company during the length of time the city had contracted to take water from the company.

I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that this amendment, having for its object, no doubt, the purpose to serve these companies as a guaranty to them against loss for five years, defeats the use of the Government factory for five years. Give them a contract of five years and a right to draw from the Treasury of the Government the price of armor plate without regard to the United States having equipped its own factory, and we are for five years right where we are now.

That being true, Mr. President, I respectfully insist that legally this Government should enter into no such contracts.

Without reading the opinion, I tender the volume to the Senator for his consideration. Therefore I must object to his amendment on the ground that it would bind the Government, making utterly ineffectual the purpose of the bill, and rendering wholly helpless the Government within the limits of five years.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I intend to vote for the measure providing for the construction or acquisition by purchase by the Government of an armor-plate factory for the reasons which have been set forth in this discussion. I will not traverse the subject proper, but I desire to make the amendment, if possible, of the Senator from Massachusetts innocuous, at least to a certain and an authorized extent.

On January 27, 1916, the Bethlehem Steel Co. proposed to supply the armor plate for the new program of construction at a rate considerably lower than the prevailing rate. The proposed rate was $395 per ton. Therefore I move to amend so as to read: "That the Secretary of the Navy," and so forth, "shall be directed to enter into a contract for armor plate" on the basis proposed in the amendment, and then add the proviso "that such price shall not exceed $395 per ton."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the five-minute rule is a sufficient assurance to Senators, so I feel justified in submitting my reasons for voting against the bill and favoring the amendment.

The measure, taking it in its entirety, is another prostitution of the power of the Government under the guise of economy. The economy is confined to the proclamation made and never reaches the Treasury. It is like a number of others of a like kind.

There seems to be an incurable propensity of the human mind to be afflicted with a series of hallucinations that a Government can do anything cheaper than private enterprise. It never has been justified by tangible evidence. There is no experience of this or any other country to show it. The more the Government undertakes to do, the greater the drain upon the Treasury and the more signal the obstacles in the way of any genuine preparedness of either our military or naval forces of the country.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts furnished a complete protection to the Government against an excess in price for the merchandise. If it were an enterprise in which no private capital was embarked, if private undertakings did not furnish an adequate armor-plate supply at reasonable prices, it might be well enough to encourage it by some governmental help. But it is essentially a private undertaking. In its nature it requires the expenditure at the outset of $11,000,000, according to the terms of the bill. When that is done the Government will have on its hands an enterprise the product of which will cost, based upon all other Government experience, where the undertaking is of a private nature, as in every other country save one, at least 33⅓ per cent more than private enterprise can produce the same article of merchandise by the application of ordinary economy that belongs to private undertakings.

For my part I believe that this measure and others of a like kind contain in them no principle of preparedness. I believe they are obstacles put in the way in that they discourage the embarking of private capital upon such an undertaking.

At no time nor place, Mr. President, do I believe the Government can in what is essentially a private undertaking exceed private enterprise in the production of the same article. The Government has no assets, the Government has no property, the Government has no money nor munitions. It is only when it draws upon the inexhaustible resources of the taxpayer and takes property gained by private enterprise that the Government has any power to protect itself in either peace or war.

There is no justification in thinking that a navy will be the sooner built by starting a private undertaking of this character. It, like all others, will call for the expenditure of money with no commensurate return in the merchandise to be used.

I have no sympathy with an undertaking that would make all munitions of war manufactured by the Government and a Government monopoly. In the end instead of building up our Army and Navy and supplying our Treasury and advancing the cause of preparedness, about which there is a good deal said, it will result inevitably in weakening that cause and in taking away from private pursuits that asset on which the Government may draw by the exercise of the powers of taxation.

As we weaken the resources of private life we weaken the ability of every citizen, corporate or individual, to pay taxes in either peace or war, and ultimately that is the source of our defense.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, have I a right to speak on the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] to my amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has that right.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I want to say that I see no reason why that amendment should not be adopted. I have not any malign or hidden purpose in offering the proposition which I have submitted. I have done so because I am opposed to the confiscation of private property, and I believe this bill is nothing more and nothing less.

I have no brief for the manufacturers of armor plate; I have had no consultation with them; but I want them to receive, as long as they are doing business with the Government, a fair return on their investment. That was my reason for using the phraseology which I did in the substitute which I offered.

One of the companies has offered to furnish armor at $395 a ton. We certainly do not want the Government to pay any more for armor than is necessary, and as far as I am concerned I will vote for the amendment of the Senator from California. I accept the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has a right to accept the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I think I ought to say a word. It has never been my intention or the intention of any member of the Naval Committee to destroy the armor plants or injure them in any way. If they go out of business and scrap their plants, as they have threatened to do, we can not help that. That is for them to decide. I feel sure the National Government will be sorry to see it done. Because they can not have their own sweet will, as they have heretofore had, is no reason for them to grow pettish and insolent and make threats. With the Government factory and those three factories all running we could turn out armor more rapidly than any nation in the world—far more than our navy yards and shipbuilding plants can build ships to put the armor on. Our efforts should be turned in that direction—the provision and equipment for shipbuilding.

I sincerely hope when this dire conflict in Europe is ended the civilized nations of the world will come to some agreement which is workable that will make the necessity for large battleship fleets a thing of the past, and that the fleets of the future will consist of merchantmen and ships for passengers only—I am sure all right-thinking men will agree with me in this—and the necessity for battle fleets will have disappeared by the time those now afloat become useless because of there being no more war and their being unfit for freight.

The billions and billions of dollars that have been wasted in the last three years could have provided in comfort for millions upon millions of poor people who are now struggling for existence and going from the cradle to the grave with little more than a bare living.

I move to lay all the amendments on the table, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. The unanimous-consent agreement provides that debate shall proceed under the five-minute rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order. The unanimous agreement provides for a five-minute debate, if desired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts as modified.

Mr. SMOOT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts a substitute or an amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a substitute.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that it be again read as amended before it is voted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Navy shall enter into negotiations with those who are now equipped to manufacture armor plate and shall, if possible, make an agreement with them, severally, which shall, in effect, apportion among them the requirements of the Government for a period not to exceed five years in proportion to their respective capacities; the price to be paid for armor plate thus contracted for to be the cost of manufacture, including all items which are ordinarily charged to a manufacturing business of a similar character under a scientific system of accounting which shall include interest actually paid upon money borrowed and to which shall be added 6 per cent per annum upon the capital employed in the business, including the replacement value of so much of the plants as are applicable to this production less any bonded or other indebtedness thereon: Provided, That such price shall not exceed $395 per ton.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LIPPITT. Inasmuch as the distinguished Senator from California has already declared that this amendment would be entirely innocuous, I hope the gentlemen on the other side will vote for it, as I have no doubt the Senator from California also will.

Mr. PHELAN. I desire distinctly to say that in announcing the proposal of the amendment to the amendment I said I was in favor of the original bill, that the Government should own its own armor-plate factory. I wish no misunderstanding on that score. It will render, I trust, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts less harmful in the event of its passage, but I am going to vote against the substitute amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts and vote for the original bill.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BORAH (when Mr. BRADY'S name was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BRADY] on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. We have made an arrangement to transfer our pairs, so that both of us can vote. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. KERN (when Mr. FLETCHER'S name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and to state that he is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I am authorized to state that if the Senator from Florida were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON (when Mr. GOFF'S name was called). I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. By a transfer he is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. Under the statement made by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], the Senator from Arkansas will stand paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], so that I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and myself both have pairs, he with a Democrat and I with a Republican. We have agreed to transfer those pairs and to vote. These pairs stand against each other, and we vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], who is unavoidably absent. As stated by the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], we have transferred our pairs. I have transferred my pair with the Senator from Florida to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], so that I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). On this particular measure I am paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. If the Senator from Wisconsin were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KERN. I desire to transfer my pair heretofore announced to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 60, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. WEEKS was rejected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add:

The Secretary of the Navy shall not proceed with the construction or purchase of the factory or factories provided for in this act provided within 60 days after the passage of this act he shall be able to contract with responsible parties for the furnishing to the Government of not less than 15,000 or more than 25,000 tons of armor plate annually for a period of five years from the 1st day of July, 1917, at a price not exceeding $280 per ton; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to make such contract.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, as I understand the report of the committee, they estimate that armor plate can be manufactured with a fair profit at $250 per ton. The lowest price at which armor has ever been secured by the Government has been about $346 a ton. That was some time ago. Since then the Government has been compelled to pay, I believe, over $400 per ton.

The armor-plate manufacturers contend that if their factories are run at full capacity they will be able to furnish armor plate at a lower price. This amendment fixes the price at not exceeding $280 per ton, a price about $30 per ton above that which the committee estimates to be the cost, and from $130 to $150 per ton below the price usually charged the Government by the armor-plate manufacturers.

The amendment provides for a contract running over a period of five years for not less than 15,000 tons annually, and not more than 25,000 tons annually, the latter being, I believe, the maximum requirement of the Government during the period of five years. When this bill goes into operation, under this amendment the Secretary of the Navy will be called upon to make the purchase or construction provided by it, unless within 60 days after its passage he is able to make a contract for five years upon the terms named.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. NEWLANDS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, the following:

Provided, however, That before any steps hereunder are taken by the Secretary of the Navy he shall enter into negotiations with the several manufacturers of armor plate in the United States for the construction of 123,000 tons of armor plate, or so much as may be required within the next five years, for the use of the Government; and if he shall be able to secure the armor plate required at such price as shall not exceed 10 per cent above the cost of production, which cost shall take into consideration the capital employed, repairs, waste, depreciation, and all other elements and items of expense which enter into the cost of production, and not exceeding $395 per ton, he shall make contract with said companies accordingly, and shall take no further steps for the construction or purchase of the factory herein provided for; but if he shall fail to secure such agreement, he shall proceed forthwith to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in all ordinary industrial pursuits that which can be done just as well by the citizen as by the Government should not be absorbed by the Government. Just to the extent that the Government projects itself into the industrial field just to that extent does it limit the opportunity for its people. And if there would be justification for entering into any purely private industry there would be the same justification for taking possession of all and conducting a purely paternalistic Government, with one employer and hundreds of millions of dependents, hopeless, ambitionless.

But while this may be true in respect to all of the ordinary industrial activities, there are certain lines of production which it seems to me should always be conducted, at least in part, by the Government. The Government must at every moment of its life be able to protect itself. It must have warships, guns, ammunition, armor plate, and those things which are the primary weapons of offense and defense. It ought to be able to secure these upon fair and reasonable terms. It ought not to be in a position whereby it can be held up by any private manufacturing establishment and exorbitant prices charged. It is because of this that we have our Government shipyards, our arsenals, our navy yard for the manufacture of naval guns, and so forth. And the same reason, Mr. President, which would justify or render necessary the production of these instrumentalities of warfare by the Government would justify the manufacture of its armor plate used on our war vessels.

I go further than this, and assert that where the Government is the only consumer of an article of production the Government might well be the only producer of such article. The fact that the Government is the only purchaser limits the number of producers. And that makes combination against the Government not only extremely easy but quite natural. It would probably have been much better for the manufacturers of armor plate if they had left the matter in the first instance to the Government itself. But it was the Government that induced them to invest about $30,000,000 so as to be able to furnish the Government its armor plate. From all the evidence produced I draw the conclusion that, measured by the investment in plants and machinery, and the expense of maintaining such plants, the profits have scarcely justified the project.

But we are met to-day with a condition rather than a theory. This is the condition: We now have armor-plate plants ready this minute to do business, and capable of producing 30,000 tons of armor plate annually, which it would cost to duplicate about $25,000,000. It would take from three to four years to build and equip a Government armor-plate plant. It would probably be five years before this plant would be turning out armor plate. This year we propose to, and undoubtedly will, vote for such increase in battleships and armored cruisers as will necessitate, according to program, 123,000 tons of armor plate. Now, we must buy this armor plate from the companies now in existence. The Government can not produce any part of this plate. The particular exigency which calls for an abnormally larger output of armor plate will have passed before the Government can begin its operations. Now, let us look at this situation squarely in the face.

The bill introduced calls for an armor-plate plant capable of producing 20,000 tons per year. This 20,000 tons per year is settled upon in the belief that after the present exigency has passed we may probably need that much per annum. And it is proposed that the Government shall produce all of the armor plate after about five years. But these 123,000 tons must be purchased from these private companies, whose plants are to be made worthless by the act of the Government at the expiration of five years. In other words, during these five years the capital invested purely in armor-plate factories and which can not be used, to any material extent, for any other purpose, will be destroyed by the act of the Government.

Now, what may we naturally expect from these private concerns? We can not get our armor plate anywhere else. We must pay their prices. Will they not charge us such prices for this plate as will not only afford them a good profit on their investment but which will assist them to get back a goodly proportion of the capital which is destroyed by the act of the Government? I know one of the concerns, the smallest, and which will produce only a very small proportion of the amount required, authorizes the statement on the floor that it will not permit that fact to become a factor in fixing the prices which it will make to the Government. I believe that we will pay at least 50 per cent more for this 123,000 tons of armor plate if this bill becomes a law than we would pay without it. Of all times this is the wrong time to change from private to Government production, and a bill designed to do all the manufacturing, and not a fair proportion of it, as this bill proposes, is in my opinion the wrong kind of a bill.

Now, I should like to see the Government put itself in a position where it can manufacture a portion of the armor plate it may need after its establishment shall be in working order. I am morally certain that it would cost the Government very much more, considering capital invested and every other proper element, to manufacture its armor plate than it would cost the private concerns. I know that even though we should erect a plant and keep it in operation these private plants could furnish at a reasonable profit armor plate cheaper than the Government could manufacture it. And so long as they should do that I would purchase it from them, operating the Government establishment only slightly, if at all. We would thus prevent any combination against the Government and would secure our armor plate at lowest reasonable rates.

With the present appropriation of $11,000,000, the Government will never build a plant that will be capable of producing 20,000 tons per year. If it would cost private parties $25,000,000 to duplicate their present structures, which are capable, in running at their full capacity, of producing 30,000 tons per annum, it is folly to talk about $11,000,000 appropriated by the Government being sufficient to build a plant that will produce 20,000 tons, remembering always that it costs the Government enormously more to build than it would cost a private individual.

With the appropriation provided for in the bill I do not believe that we could erect a plant that would be capable of producing over 10,000 tons; but of course, Mr. President, it is not expected that this $11,000,000 will be anything but a starter. We will draw our plans for a plant to produce 20,000 tons per year, and then we will be compelled, probably, to vote $20,000,000 more for it before we get through.

Now, what ought to be done under these circumstances is this: There ought to be a provision in the bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to negotiate with the present armor-plate manufacturers for the manufacture of this 123,000 tons of armor plate. And if the Secretary of the Navy can secure from these private concerns the manufactured armor plate for such a price as would be a reasonable return upon investment, including in the computation capital employed, deterioration, repairs, waste, and all other matters that enter into the question of cost, then he shall make a contract with them for the entire amount needed. If he fails to secure such a contract, he shall proceed with the construction of the Federal plant.

The testimony shows that these plants have offered, if they can secure the entire contract, to produce these armor plates for $395 per ton. Now, I do not know whether that is higher than it should be. If I were to base my judgment on what other nations are paying, I would think we were securing the product very cheap, indeed. A table of prices paid in other countries shows that for turret armor the prices range from $729 down to $444 per ton; the United States, $496 per ton; that Krupp side armor ranges from $511 per ton to $368, the United States price being $425 per ton. Of course, I do not know just what the quality furnished to other Governments may be. It is claimed that our armor plate is superior to that of any other country.

But those figures are not conclusive. It may be that notwithstanding the very much higher prices paid by the Governments of the Old World for their armor plate, the American manufacturer can afford to furnish the Government with plate at reasonable profit much lower than he is now doing.

But here, I understand, another proposition has been put up to the Government, and I have not the slightest doubt but that the proffer is in good faith, because the owner of these plants, which can be used for no other purpose than the manufacture of armor plate, would desire to keep the plants in operation at a very reasonable profit rather than have them idle and their capital invested charged to loss. I have no doubt but that the Government could enter into an agreement with any of these concerns; that if it would give them a profit, say, of 8 per cent in the production of armor plate, the company would allow the Government accountants and experts to scrutinize and pass upon every item of expense.

So, Mr. President, whatever may have been the profits to manufacturers in the past, it is quite certain that the Government to-day is in a position to guard itself against extortionate charges and to secure its armor plate vastly cheaper than any other nation in the world and much cheaper than the Government could produce it. It is estimated that this armor plate can be produced to-day for $367.82 per ton. Suppose we should add 8 per cent to that for profit. That would make a cost of $397.24 per ton. These companies offer to produce it for $395 per ton, or $2.24 lower than an 8 per cent profit. And this cost of $367.82 is based on running at two-thirds capacity. As a matter of fact, so far, the companies have been able to run a little over half their capacity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on a previous roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). As announced before, I have a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Repeating the same announcement about the transfer of my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement I did a little while ago, so that the pairs of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and myself will stand paired with each other, I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair, if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea," and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] would vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

So Mr. McCUMBER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following as a new section:

That expert chartered public accountants shall be employed to open a set of books, which shall exhibit every item of expense, direct and collateral, which may properly be charged against the preparation of the plans, the selection and purchase of a site, the construction and equipment of the proposed plant, and the cost per ton of the output for each month of the operation of the plant.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I hope there will be no objection to that proposition. It is simply a bookkeeping one, to determine the cost of the construction of the plant and the manufacture of armor in the plant.

I assume that there is an honest difference of opinion among Senators as to whether the Government should manufacture its own supplies of this kind or should purchase them from private manufacturers. I think here is an opportunity to determine absolutely whether the Government can manufacture as cheaply as it can buy in the market; and all that this suggestion I have made amounts to is that a set of books shall be kept which will furnish Congress with the absolute information as to the cost of the enterprise and the cost of the manufacture of armor.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. His amendment says "that expert chartered public accountants" shall be employed. The word "chartered" means licensed by some State, does it not, under State laws?

Mr. WEEKS. That is what I understand. I think that is the usual phraseology.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not know whether it was or not.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the Navy Department at present, pursuant to law passed several years ago, keeps its own books. Every item of cost is included. I do not know to what extent this might change the entire keeping of books by the Navy Department. Senators will be able to ascertain the cost of this armor plant and its product. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. I suspect that is just what we want to avoid, so that the Government may have independent authority as to the expense of this enterprise, and not have the Navy Department keep its own accounts and do the work itself. Certainly no legitimate enterprise can object to having a chartered accountant keep books and keep an account of the expenses.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is a remarkable argument to come from the lips of gentlemen who have been justifying these private monopolies in refusing to tell the Government their costs or expenses. It appears that they are quite willing to protect the private institution from exposing its business to the world, but are very anxious that the Government shall do that which they say the private party should not be required to do.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, there has been no time when such chartered accountants would not have been welcomed into any of the armor plants affected by this bill.

Mr. REED. Why, Mr. President, the sworn testimony is to the effect that these gentlemen refused to disclose their business except under a seal of confidence.

Mr. PENROSE. They did object to giving it to a public committee and having it spread broadcast throughout the land, but they never objected to having a chartered accountant look through their books and report confidentially to the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. REED. But now the Senator would like to have it reported to Congress, which, of course, would be entirely confidential.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; and if the laxity of administration and the extravagance of the matter is such as to shock the American people I for one will endeavor to keep it as confidential as possible for the sake of the majority who are now putting through this bill.

Mr. REED. To that end the Senator would have it reported to Congress and the country, of course.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will prevail. I am sure the Members of the Senate can see a radical difference between a report that is made to the Congress of the United States about an industry in which all of the people are stockholders, because it is built and run with the money which is derived from the taxes they pay, and a private industry in which the general public are not stockholders, and whose reports properly are made to the people whose investments have built and run the establishment.

But that is not the real reason why I should like to see this amendment added to the bill. I believe that if the Government of the United States is going into the construction and the operation of manufacturing plants of various kinds, it is of vital importance to us at the very beginning of that policy that some proper, scientific method should be established of informing the public with regard to the benefit that accrues to them from such operations.

The charge is continually being made that the information given of the operations of Government-owned plants is not complete and thorough. I am quite sure that the people who are intrusted with the operation of those plants are always under a little inducement to make their reports as favorable as they can to the enterprises for which they are responsible. It is only human nature that they should. But in all properly run private enterprises of any considerable size to-day the policy of employing outside accountants to check the figures of the officers of those institutions is adopted. It is a revolution that has come about within the last few years, within, perhaps, a dozen years, in the management of those establishments. It is very proper that the Government, in the management of similar establishments, should adopt the best precedents of business operations.

I am not speaking about this amendment because it applies to this particular suggestion of an armor plant. I believe it should be applied generally to all departments of the Government; and I think very valuable information can be secured, and very great economy would result from it. It should be a policy of the Government with respect to all its manufacturing or businesslike operations.

I am very strongly in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts as a general policy.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to say, for the information of the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senate, that this is not without precedent in the American Government. A good many years ago I was chairman of a joint committee consisting of the members of the Senate and House Committees on Post Offices and Post Roads. We hired two firms of chartered accountants, the biggest we could get in the city of New York, who had records for investigating some of the public offices in Australia and Canada and many large corporations, and we put them on the Post Office Department. We expended many thousands of dollars—I think fifty or seventy-five thousand dollars—on the work, and acquired a vast amount of information which has been from time to time embodied in legislation in appropriation bills for the Post Office Department. The report made by those accountants is, I think, looked upon by everyone who has read it as of a monumental character.

I entirely agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that it would be well if this chartered-accountant proposition could be applied to other departments; but certainly when the Government is going into this unique program of industrial manufacture it is preeminently proper.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. It is an amendment which, it seems to me, ought to be supported by any man who has experience in business or who is at all familiar with business matters.

I have been connected with various enterprises during my lifetime, and I have always insisted upon the employment of chartered accountants with reference to such matters. These chartered accountants are professionals, without interest, without bias. They have their reputations to maintain, and they are noted for their exactness and for their integrity. I see no reason why the Government, when it enters upon a business, should not pursue business methods.

The argument that has been presented, that because the manufacturers insist upon secrecy with reference to their costs and their processes the Government should pursue similar methods, has no weight with me. The Congress of the United States by this very proceeding is indicting the private manufacturers of the country for refusing to disclose these costs. Therefore when it proposes to enter upon this business it can not with consistency refuse to disclose to the people of the entire country, who are really conducting this business, the cost of its operation. And, in my judgment, it can not refuse to permit the methods that are pursued by business men and corporations throughout the country to be put into force with a view to ascertaining such costs.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will prevail.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I expect to vote for the pending bill, but not on the ground of economy. Of course, the Government should construct armor plate as cheaply as it can be reasonably done. I am voting as I expect to do upon principle. I am not proposing to vote for the bill, because I believe that prices have been kept up by a monopoly. I do not know whether they have been or not. My own judgment is that the Government of the United States should manufacture not only its armor plate but the arms and munitions that are used, whether in offensive or defensive warfare. I believe that anything that is manufactured for the purpose of killing human beings should not be left to the speculation of profit on the part of individuals or corporations.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I thought that all the information that is sought to be obtained by this amendment would not be obtained without it, and if the amendment were limited to the output of the factory instead of its construction as well, I would very gladly support the amendment. In my judgment, it provides a different method of obtaining the cost than the Government would have already, and would necessarily put onto the Government a new bureau that would be entirely unnecessary, and would have a different law applied to this construction than applies to everything else that the Government constructs, and all other departments where it is using appropriations of Congress for various purposes.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. This amendment provides that expert chartered public accountants shall be employed. If the Government, under the civil-service law or any other law, has in its employ now accountants, bookkeepers, and a sufficient number of other employees to provide for obtaining the information that would be obtained through the operation of this amendment, it is unnecessary to duplicate it; and if you are going to add this to it you will simply add, as I look at it, the necessary machinery that is provided here that perhaps the Government already has.

As far as the construction of the plant is concerned and the machinery that is purchased out of this appropriation, the appropriation and the use of it and the vouchers for it will of themselves show every penny—what it was for and who got it. When the plant is completed and we go into the manufacture of armor plate, then we ought not to put upon this law a different system than we probably have in the various departments of the Government now.

I should like to get this information; and if the amendment simply said that it should be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy or some other official having charge of this expenditure to keep an accurate account of the cost of armor plate—although I think it would be done anyway, without any such amendment—I would cheerfully vote for it myself. But it does not seem to me the proper thing to add on here a lot of machinery and create really a new bureau that will of itself be expensive, when probably we are already properly equipped for doing all the work that would be done under this amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator, if he desires to ask a question.

Mr. WEEKS. I simply want to call attention to the fact that all that these expert public accountants do is to prepare a set of books which would show these costs.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be so, we ought not to have a different set of books or a different set of bookkeeping for this business than we have for any other. If the amendment simply provided that the Secretary of the Navy should keep accurate accounts of the cost of the manufacture of armor plate, and report to Congress, then certainly it could do no harm, and even though it would be a duplicate law I would gladly support it. But I do not believe, as it stands now, it ought to be added to the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a very proper amendment. In my judgment, if such a provision were arranged for all the departments we would run the Government about $100,000,000 a year cheaper than we are running it now. There is no part of the Government that is quite so expensive and extravagant as those departments which pass upon their own accounts and which make their own reports. If we could have this arrangement so that there would be a checking in the proposition I think we would more than save the expense that the special accountant would cost.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask that the proposed amendment be again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be again read.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section to the bill as follows:

SEC. 2. That expert, chartered, public accountants shall be employed to open a set of books, which shall exhibit every item of expense, direct and collateral, which may properly be charged against the preparation of the plans, the selection and purchase of a site, the construction and equipment of the proposed plant, and the cost per ton of the output for each month of the operation of the plant.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does that mean that the accountants are to continue to keep the books or to simply outline a plan by which the Treasury Department shall keep them? If it means that the expert accountants are to indicate the way in which the books are to be kept and thereafter perhaps once a year the accountants shall have the privilege of examining them and checking them up as is done in large business enterprises, I would very cordially vote for the amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, this is simply a proposition to keep a set of books which will show every possible cost connected with this enterprise. It has nothing whatever to do with the continuation of the keeping of books or the auditing of books. I think it answers the Senator's desire exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is simply to open the books and not to continue to keep them, but to outline the plan in which the books shall be kept?

Mr. WEEKS. That is it exactly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am rather at a loss to understand what rule the Senate is operating under, whether Senators are proceeding without recognition or not, the Senator from Georgia having proceeded to address the Senate without having been recognized by the Chair after I was on my feet.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought the Chair recognized me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, why should there be any objection to an amendment of this character? Certainly it is desirable and important that Congress should understand what the cost of this armor plate is to the Government. I venture to say that there is not a department of the Government operated in such a way or its accounts kept in such a way that anyone can tell what the cost of operating that department is. I know that is so with reference to the Post Office Department. No one can tell anything about it. It is reported sometimes that the Post Office Department is making $10,000,000 a year over and above expenditures. It is again reported that the Post Office Department is losing money, and nobody can arrive at the exact facts with reference to it, because the accounts are kept in such a way that it is impossible to do it.

For example, the amount of salary paid to the Postmaster General, the amounts paid to the various general offices of the Post Office Department, are not kept in the accounts of that department, but they are kept in the Treasury Department. The salaries are paid out of the general fund. No account is kept, so far as the Post Office Department is concerned, with reference to the buildings which are erected in which the business of the Post Office Department is conducted; no account is kept of the upkeep of those buildings, so that we know absolutely nothing about these items. Certainly a method by which we will be able to determine accurately what the Government of the United States will be paying for its armor plate will be of the utmost value and that is all the amendment seeks to establish.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I sincerely hope the amendment will be adopted. Those of us who favor the Government manufacture of arms and munitions are constantly met with this difficulty: When the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy reports the cost of the articles which are now being made by the Government, it is said that certain elements of cost have been omitted, and these reports are not received with that confidence and conclusiveness which they ought to have.

I therefore believe that those of us who favor the policy which the bill initiates ought to favor the examination of the accounts by those whose business it is to ascertain the cost, in order that we may confidently rest upon the information we receive respecting the cost of manufacture.

Mr. NORRIS. I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the Senator from Massachusetts insert the following:

The Secretary of the Navy shall keep an accurate and itemized account of the cost per ton of the product of such factory or factories and report the same to Congress in his annual report.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WEEKS. I have.

Mr. OLIVER. Is not that done already?

Mr. WEEKS. That does not answer the purpose at all.

Mr. PENROSE. It does not mean anything.

Mr. WEEKS. What is desirable is for us to know absolutely what this armor-making plant costs and how much it costs to make armor. How any one can object to that information being furnished the stockholders of the Government, who are the American people, is something that I can not understand. There is nothing else in my amendment except a businesslike proposition. It seems to me that it should appeal to everyone.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, the difficulty about the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts lies, as I understand it, in the fact that it clothes the accountant with the power to say what is and what is not cost. One of the great controversies now raging with reference to production of various articles by various departments of the Government is over what shall be charged to the particular article that is produced. I listened to an argument one day in a learned body where it was demonstrated absolutely in that case that an article which might be purchased in the market for $85 cost something like $3,500. That resulted from a difference in the charge of the overhead expenses of the article which was produced.

We are not going to settle that controvery by a public accountant who does not know anything about what constitutes cost. You can hire a man to open a set of books, but here you propose to clothe him with authority to fix costs. I would welcome the opportunity, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] says, to have it established once for all whether or not a plant of this kind can be operated by the Government on something like the basis that it has heretofore been operated on in private hands. But there are difficulties about bringing about a comparison that are insuperable it seems to me. The private corporations have their own difficulties with reference to what should or should not be charged to overhead charges.

Reference has been made in the debate here to-day about great bonuses paid to certain employees of the corporation, and the salaries that are paid to the president and vice president and secretary, and the question has been raised whether or not they should be properly charged up to the armor plate or charged up to generosity on the part of the controlling officers of the corporation. That is a debatable question.

The question immediately arises whether or not the salaries of officers who hitherto have been engaged in the operation of inspecting armor plate is to be charged now as a part of the costs. If those are charged as part of the cost, then the salaries that they receive now comes off the cost of some other governmental department, because you can not charge an officer's salary to two departments. If Congress is going into this matter it should decide this question for itself, and it does not seem to me a proper place to do a thing of that kind in the closing hours of the debate on the floor of the Senate under the five-minute rule, I am not prepared to pass upon it.

I listened twice to the reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts and I find myself unable to altogether grasp or visualize what it will bring about. The Senator from Massachusetts knows a good deal more about the language he has employed than I ever hope to learn. I do not want this plant to go into operation handicapped by an artificial system of cost which is going to make the armor appear a good deal dearer than it really is, and then have a report to this body of this accountant or an unfriendly official of some sort cited to us on every occasion when we attempt to have the Government engage in what we regard as a proper governmental activity.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the committee has no desire not to let Congress by proper legislation obtain all the information necessary that is just and fair, without entirely displacing the entire bookkeeping system that might exist in the Navy Department. It has no objection whatever to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. That provides what? That the Secretary of the Navy shall furnish Congress an itemized account and a full statement of every item of the cost of production in the question of armor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, it directs that to be done, and we shall have a report here itemizing the cost in every respect. If that is not satisfactory to Congress when the report comes in, Congress has power to employ a chartered accountant. Congress has power to appoint experts. Congress has power to summon him before a committee and ascertain whether he has given an accurate account.

This proposes to start in the Navy Department an entirely new set of bookkeeping. There is no item of expenditure that is not passed on by the Comptroller of the Treasury on vouchers from the Navy Department. They have a complete set of books that shows every item of cost. If there is a dispute and the Senator wants to know the cost every item of it is given, and then he can determine it for himself.

If the Senator from Idaho desires to interrupt me I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. BORAH. I was simply going to say that the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] does not add anything to the situation, because we can call for information. That is provided for without any amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. But it directs him to report to Congress.

Mr. BORAH. We can direct him.

Mr. SWANSON. It directs him when he makes a report to start with the books at the beginning, so that when he makes report to Congress we can have a full, accurate, and complete statement of whatever items enter into the cost of the armor. If Congress is not satisfied with that, it has full opportunity to employ expert accountants, and then to summon them before Congress to ascertain whether their account is accurate or not.

It seems to me the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska is all that can be expected, and we will get all the information we desire without entirely changing the system of bookkeeping in the Navy Department.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am in favor of the pending measure, and I would not vote for any amendment that, in my opinion, would jeopardize the bill, but I can not see that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts would in any way embarrass or endanger the measure.

It is true, Mr. President, that it is difficult to say what the cost of armor plate will be. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] well illustrated that. He said the Government of the United States would still have to buy its material from the steel plant, and that is true; and the cost of steel ingots and other material entering into the manufacture of armor plate would, of course, be factors in determining the price of armor.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the bill because I believe the American people are in favor of it. I believe the American people are in favor of the Government of the United States manufacturing not only armor plate but all munitions of war, as the Senator from California so well said. But we are taking the people's money to build these armor factories. The people of the country are the stockholders, and they have a right to know what it is going to cost.

I am one who will be numbered among those Senators who will be held responsible for this legislation, because I intend to vote for the bill.

For that reason, Mr. President, I want to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, because I believe the public has a right to know what the officials of the Government are doing, and for what purpose and how the money is being expended.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I shall occupy the floor for just one minute. Every man who has passed through the experience of manufacturing knows that it is quite easy to keep your books so that you can make yourself appear rich or appear poor. You can make the cost of the article that you are manufacturing seem small or large. It depends always on how you separate the running expenses.

It seems to me if we are going to undertake this expense at all, we ought at the very beginning to have chartered accountants and we ought to have a system that will enable us to detect at once whether the department is trying to make the expense of armor more or less than it ought to be.

I certainly believe that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts ought to prevail if we are going to act in a businesslike way in regard to the measure.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is uncertain, but will leave it to the Senator from Nebraska whether he has already spoken.

Mr. NORRIS. Not on my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the object of the amendment, as explained by the Senator from Massachusetts and those who favor the amendment, is to ascertain the cost of armor plate. That is the object of the substitute I have offered. They would probably either one accomplish the same purpose if it would not be already accomplished without the adoption of either one. The difference is that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will engraft upon the Government practically a new bureau. It will make it necessary to go out and employ a public chartered, licensed accountant, and it will probably result in the adoption of a new system of bookkeeping for this one particular business different from every other public business.

If the Secretary carries out in good faith the substitute that I have offered, it will be necessary for him to do whatever is requisite to get the actual cost of every item that enters into the construction of armor plate. That is all we want, that is all we ought to want, and that is all we can get under any amendment; but he will do that through the instrumentalities of his office as they exist now, without a new bureau and without additional expense.

If we want the Government to make armor plate, we are all interested in having it made just as cheaply as it can be done. Therefore it seems to me we ought to pause now before ingrafting upon the bill something which we all know will necessarily bring expense and add to the cost of armor plate.

It has been well stated by some Senator here in the course of the debate this afternoon that there is always a great difference of opinion as to what should be included as a matter of cost. That difference may exist, no matter what system we adopt. We have the power when the report comes in, if we are not satisfied with the items, to appoint a committee of this body to investigate and to employ experts, if we desire to do so, to examine the figures; but we have been arguing this bill all the way through, for instance, on the theory that it costs the Government for armor plate only what we actually pay to those who manufacture the armor plate, yet it has developed that every piece of armor plate that has ever been made has been inspected by Government inspectors, the expense for whom is not included in the cost.

It will probably develop, when we go into the manufacture of armor plate, that similar occurrences may take place. For instance, if we buy of the steel company to-day a ton of armor plate that we have inspected, we ordinarily speak of its cost at the appropriation price—what we have paid to the men who make it—but, as a matter of fact, we have our experts, employees of the Government, who are devoting all their time to the inspection of armor plate as it is made, and who watch it through every process of manufacture. The expense for that could properly be added to the cost, perhaps. When the Secretary brings in his itemized account—and if the substitute which I have offered should be adopted, the Secretary will have to itemize the account—we shall know upon its face what each charge is for; and if there is anything that is not plain, we shall have our remedy.

It would be the same if the other method were adopted and the itemized expenditures come in, except that it would cost us more to get the information. Believing in the manufacture of armor plate by the Government, I want it manufactured as cheaply as it can be done, and we all do so, whether we are in favor of going into the business in a governmental way or not. Therefore, it seems to me, if we are going to get the same information, that we ought to cut out the unnecessary expense and not adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], but should adopt the substitute, which will bring the same information.

Mr. VARDAMAN and others. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. PENROSE and Mr. VARDAMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement which I did on the former ballot, I vote "yea."

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. If he were present and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same statement that I did upon the preceding vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who has been obliged to leave the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as I did on the former roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I desire to say that, if present, he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay" if I were at liberty to vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 47, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—47.

Ashurst	Johnson, Me.	Owen	Simmons

So the substitute of Mr. NORRIS for the amendment of Mr. WEEKS was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments?

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, the vote which has just been taken resulted, as I understand, in the substitution of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts? I understand the question of the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts still has to be voted on by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What question?

Mr. LIPPITT. The amendment as amended has still to be acted on by the Senate, as I understand.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment to the bill has not yet been acted upon.

Mr. LIPPITT. Was it an amendment or a substitute?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was proposed as a substitute.

Mr. LIPPITT. Then, it takes the place of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It takes the place of the amendment.

Mr. LIPPITT. Then, is not the question on the amendment? The amendment to the bill has not yet been voted on, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course, it has not yet been voted on.

Mr. LIPPITT. I ask to have the amendment, as it is now before the Senate, read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Navy shall keep accurate and itemized account of the cost per ton of the product of such factory or factories and report the same to Congress in his annual report.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, while I was very much in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], I see no benefit to be derived from adding to the bill that amendment as it now stands. The method of arriving at the cost of producing the armor suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts was an efficient, businesslike one, while the method now proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is flabby and meaningless. It simply provides that the Secretary of the Navy, under watch of himself, is to furnish to the public the information which in the ordinary course of the performance of the duties of his department he is now under obligation to furnish. I am very sorry that the Senators responsible for this measure, who for the last two weeks have been condemning the armor-plate manufacturers of this country for refusal to make public the details of their business, and have been complaining that they refused to present the information to the Congress in a proper and businesslike form should now, by the adoption of this substitute, nullify the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, and go on record here as being willing to start the Government manufacture of armor under exactly the same conditions as to the publication of information which they have for weeks been condemning on the part of the armor-plate manufacturers of this country. It is a most inconsistent and unbusinesslike proceeding, and I venture to say it will come back to plague them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have taken no part in this rather long and interesting debate, but I will avail myself of the five minutes accorded to me to say that my views on the question of Government ownership are so well known that I will not take any time either to repeat or to elaborate them, beyond saying that, if the Government invades the domain of private enterprise in the matter of manufacturing armor plate, there is no reason why the Government shall not enlarge its activities and engage in other business enterprises, private as well as public. This is the adoption of a policy which, in my judgment, will halt individual enterprise, paralyze individual energy, discourage individual capital, and relegate our people to the tender mercies of governmental activity and governmental control. It is a dangerous experiment from every point of view.

Mr. President, I have heard lurid denunciations of men who are captains of industry, and I have listened time and time again to a denunciation of Mr. Schwab because of the fact that in the long ago he was penalized because some material which he furnished to the Government was not up to standard. Why, Mr. President, if that incident, which has long ago passed out of sight, is an indictment against the men who are manufacturing armor plate for this Government, we might just as well cite as an indictment of the Engineer Corps of the Army the case of Capt. Oberlin Carter, who, while an officer of the Army, expending the money of the Government, defrauded the Government and robbed it of hundreds of thousands of dollars, for which he was imprisoned in a penitentiary of the United States. It is not a sufficient argument to say that if one man has done wrong the men whom he represents or the class to which he belongs should be denominated, as they have been in this debate, as robbers and men unworthy of the confidence of the American people.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] on the 8th day of February reported the bill which is now under consideration. Eight days later the Senator from South Carolina, to show how tenderly he feels toward the men who are engaged in these enterprises and who are manufacturing armor, introduced a bill, Senate bill 4493, in which it is provided that the Government may summarily take possession of any one of those plants, and then the Government, instead of paying the price of those plants, shall compel these men to go to the Court of Claims to establish the fact that the Government is indebted to them. After the plant has been seized and the Government has taken possession of it, then it is provided that its owners may bring suit in the Court of Claims of the United States and recover such compensation as may be legally and justly due to said companies, or either of them, and said Court of Claims shall hear and determine such suit as other suits against the United States are heard and determined.

And then, Mr. President, it is provided that if the Court of Claims finds the sum for which the Government ought to be held responsible, those whose property has been taken may come to Congress and ask us to make an appropriation to compensate them. It is a most remarkable bill, and it shows, Mr. President, the animus which has governed those who are advocating the measure which is now under consideration.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I want to say that before that could be done they would have to get the consent of the State of Pennsylvania, and that would give them some little trouble.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so.

Mr. President, I assume that this bill is to pass the Senate, but I have confidence to believe that it may be halted elsewhere. It will pass this body because the President of the United States has ordained that it shall pass; it will pass this body because the Democratic majority has so ordered; and the minority is powerless to prevent it.

The legislation is a part of the Democratic policy that has already alarmed the business interests of the country, and will doubtless continue until after the next national election, when the party of conservatism and sound economic views will be restored to power. Until then we must content ourselves with "watchful waiting," and struggle along as best we can under the burden of bad legislation, such as we are now considering.

Mr. President, I was astounded that the majority of this body did not accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. During the hearings the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who has taken so active a part in this controversy, asked Mr. Grace, president of the Bethlehem Co., this question:

> Have you any objection to having a public accountant going through your books, and thus enabling this committee to see what your books show as to the cost of armor plate from 1887 to the present time?
> Mr. GRACE. I have no objection to a public accountant, properly authorized, and in whom we would both have confidence, being allowed to go over the situation.

And yet the Senator from Virginia voted against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts!

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad I got that in before my five minutes expired.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair gave the Senator a half minute extra.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, it is very evident, of course, that this bill is going to pass. Since I have been a Member of Congress I have at times felt that the Government would be justified in making its own armor plate, opposed as I am to the Government entering the field of individual enterprize. I do not, however, believe that this is the time to experiment in that direction, burdened as we are with taxation and Treasury deficits. I think that if we are in danger, as the President intimates, it would be very shortsighted indeed to weaken our arm by damming up the ordinary sources of supply and crippling our supply of armor plate for immediate use.

I do not know how many Senators are familiar with the fact that we have now in process of construction in the navy yards of this country a program aggregating nearly $200,000,000. The President, in his recent trip through the West, stated that we are in great danger, and that he will not be responsible for what a day may bring forth. Yet, Mr. President, so far as my information goes, the navy yards are proceeding in the same leisurely way to complete work authorized years ago, when if an emergency exists they could easily double the productive capacity of our yards. Indeed, this administration has signalized its entry into international complications by selling two of our ships of war to foreign Governments for approximately the amount which it is now proposed to invest in an armor-plate factory.

I can not conceive it to be the part of prudence for us now to undertake to make an appropriation for a Government armor-plate plant which will be of no avail to the American people for three or four years at least. If we are in danger and it is threatening, we should buy our armor plate from any source which will give us an appropriate and speedy supply, and not enter upon a plan at such a juncture which will have a strong tendency to curtail the supply and expose us to danger.

So far as my information goes, present prices are not exorbitant. They are at least lower, much lower, than those afforded to the people of other lands, and the proposition of one of the big companies to make our armor plate this year on a basis which shall include only a fair return upon actual cost seems to me to invite the serious consideration of the Senate.

I do not understand how we can be in great danger and yet give out contracts for the completion of our ships of war two and three years hence and start an ambitious program of supplying our own armor plate which will not become effective until all present danger is past.

I know it is perfectly fruitless for me to undertake to arrest the Senate in its purpose to try out this experiment, costly and immature as it is. It is an old plan. It is not new. We have all been familiar with it for years; and perhaps there may be some wisdom in it, but for present purposes it is far from wise, when our Treasury is so depleted that we must resort to extraordinary taxation to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government, and yet we now propose to put $11,000,000 into a plant which will not be available for at least three or four years. So far as I am concerned this does not appeal to me as a necessary part of your ambitious program of immediate preparedness.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, we have been regaled very much this afternoon by the lamentations of Senators upon the other side. When it was apparent a year or two ago that the Republican Party was, as we thought, on its deathbed, it repented, or said it did; but, like most deathbed repentances, when a recovery was had it resumed its old, sinful ways; and here to-day we find eminent Republicans, who are considered to be presidential timber, standing on the floor of the Senate of the United States openly and defiantly championing the cause of the most odious monopoly that ever disgraced the United States. This deathbed repentance of the Republican Party proves to be just like most other deathbed repentances. If it recovers, the repentance "does not go."

Odious monopoly? Mr. President, in 1913 the representatives of the three companies manufacturing armor plate came to Washington, registered at the same hotel, held conferences, and submitted bids for armor plate for the battleship Pennsylvania, and when the bids were opened they did not vary a single dollar. All three were identical, and were $34 a ton higher than any bids ever before submitted.

It is suggested that this is because of "scientific cost accounting."

Patriotism? Why, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday in his speech said: "Of course, we can not buy armor plate from Japan or other countries, because their patriotism would prevent them from selling it to us." I am giving the substance only of the Senator's statement. How about the patriotism of the armor-plate makers here in our country? Mr. President, while we are talking of patriotism let us not forget that in 1894 the Bethlehem Co. sold armor plate to Russia at $249 a ton, and at the same time it was under a contract, made in 1893, to sell armor plate to our Government at $616.14 a ton. In 1911 this same company sold armor plate to Italy at $395 a ton and were charging the United States $420 per ton. Later this company sold it to Japan for $406.35 a ton as against $504 a ton to this country.

Yes, Mr. President—patriots!—p-a-y-t-r-i-o-t-s instead of p-a-t-r-i-o-t-s! [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I have not taken up any time in this discussion, believing it wise to leave it to the older heads; but it has not been because I have not been deeply interested. I believe in the Government ownership of any or all factories producing munitions of war if it so desires; and I do not believe that under this bill the factories now operating would lose any money that they should justly have, because I believe that satisfactory arrangements would be made under this bill whereby their factories, or some of them, might be purchased. Occasions might arise, Mr. President, when we would have use for much more of the armor-plate product than we can manufacture at this time or some future time, and any delay in the passage of the bill under consideration might defeat its real object. As for myself, I think conditions might arise when we might all conclude that the investment was a good one, if we never did anything more than to store away a good supply of this and other war munitions for the future; and I shall certainly vote for this bill, believing that I am doing my duty to my convictions and our Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the conditions of the armor-plate industry are such, in my judgment, as to require the construction of an armor plant by the Government unless a reasonable price can be assured. The existence of three organizations which have the exclusive manufacture of armor plate indicates that at any time they can, by a combination or understanding, fix the price, and we all feel assured that in the past the price has been too high.

I have also thought it might be well to have an armor plant, as my colleague has suggested, as a reserve against conditions of emergency in the future; but I was unwilling to cast my vote for an armor plant until every assurance of a reasonable price was hopeless. I offered an amendment to this bill providing that if within 60 days after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Navy should be able to make a contract for five years for all the Government requirements at the price of $280 per ton, then the purchase or construction of a plant by the Government should not be undertaken. I regret that that amendment was not adopted. I assume that it was not adopted because the Senators on this side of the Chamber thought that the price was too high and the Senators on the other side of the Chamber thought it was too low. I fixed that price after surveying the various prices that had been charged by these organizations, running from over $500 per ton down to about $346, and upon the statement of the committee that the cost as ascertained by the committee was about $252 per ton, and the admission, as I understand, of the corporations interested in this manufacture that that was within 10 per cent of the cost. I therefore added 10 per cent to the $250 and made the price about $280 per ton.

I regret that that amendment was not agreed to. I also regret that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] was not agreed to. It seemed to me only reasonable and proper that the method of ascertaining the cost suggested by this committee to the manufacturers should be adopted by the Government itself and that the well-known and established practice of opening up books of cost to the action of expert accountants should be followed by the Government, as it has been by almost all business enterprises.

Notwithstanding the failure of these amendments, I feel that the condition of the industry is such as to require the construction of a Government plant, for the reason that I have given, and I shall vote for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made on a former ballot as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement I made on the former roll calls, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). On account of the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer as already announced, I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). To make the RECORD clear, I desire to announce that I have a pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], and the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has a pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. We have transferred those pairs, so that the Senator from South Carolina and I can vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). On this measure I am paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who, if here, would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce again the absence of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. If the Senator from Florida were present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 58, nays 23, as follows:

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. O'GORMAN, it was Ordered, That Mr. KERN, a Senator from Indiana, be appointed to fill the vacancy in the membership of the Committee on Finance caused by the death of Mr. SHIVELY.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 123, submitted by Mr. BANKHEAD on the 9th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized during the Sixty-fourth Congress to send for books and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a price not to exceed $1 per printed page to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before the said committee; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate; and the expense thereof shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m., Tuesday, March 21, 1916) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 22, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 21, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who hast been our refuge and our strength, a very present help in trouble, from the beginning of our national life down to the present hour, be Thou still our strength, our support, our guide. The sky is overcast with dark and ominous clouds, the atmosphere is charged with electric currents which threaten to break in thunderbolts upon us. "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." Help us to realize, therefore, that if our work lives and bears acceptable fruit, it must be in accordance with the laws which Thou hast established. Inspire us with wisdom, courage, fortitude, that we may be actuated by the highest and purest motives, assured that Thy benediction shall follow us as a people evermore. For Thou art the God of peace and of power, of wisdom and justice, of liberty and righteousness. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

On motion of Mr. HAY, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN Does the gentleman desire to withdraw the amendment which was pending last evening?

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not understand that there was any amendment pending last evening. We adopted part of the amendment which was pending, and this is a new amendment which is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the other will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will report the new amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANTHONY: Insert after the word "relieved," in lines 13 and 14, page 25, the following:

"The lieutenant colonel and three majors of said regiment shall be appointed from the senior captains in regimental rank of the Porto Rico regiment mentioned in the act of March 4, 1915, and captains of the Porto Rico regiment mentioned in said act shall also be eligible to such detached service, transfer, or assignment to duty with other organizations as may be approved by the Secretary of War."

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman explain that in just a word?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I will say for the benefit of the House that this amendment makes no vital change in the intent of the provision in the bill, except that it gives authority to the Secretary of War to transfer certain officers of that regiment to duty with other organizations.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman means to other regiments in our continental Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. In the balance of the Army, or makes them eligible for special detail. We tried last year to so provide for them by special legislation, but the Judge Advocate General ruled that under the language of the legislation he would be unable to do that, and this is an effort to confer that authority.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It has been some time since I have given special attention to the status of that Porto Rican regiment. What about the subordinate officers below the rank of captain? How are they appointed?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is the intent of the language of the bill to withdraw the lieutenant colonel and the two majors who are detailed there from the Regular Establishment and to allow those places to be filled by promotions——

Mr. SLAYDEN. From the natives?

Mr. ANTHONY. From the regimental captains. That in turn will promote the Porto Ricans from the lower ranks, from lieutenants to captains, the places made vacant by promoting some of these American officers to the positions of major and lieutenant colonel. And ultimately the Porto Rican officers would also be promoted to be field officers.

Mr. SLAYDEN. As the gentleman's party believes in equality and fraternity, why not give those higher places to natives?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that the paragraph we struck out last night would have done that at once. It was a paragraph that I offered in committee, but I found on looking at it further that it would have permitted an officer recently promoted from lieutenant to captain to be immediately jumped to lieutenant colonel, and that was thought to be rather too sudden promotion and would deprive some of the present officers of an opportunity for advancement they have earned by long service.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Rapid promotion is not thought to be extraordinary or revolutionary in other branches of the service, is it?

Mr. ANTHONY. It would be a little radical in this instance, in my opinion.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But not objectionable to the beneficiaries.

Mr. MANN. May we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. TOWNER: Page 25, line 22, after the word "age," insert a new section as follows:

"That one additional Infantry regiment, with organization as prescribed in section 6 of this act, and subject to the provisions of sections 11 and 12 of this act regarding the officers of said regiment, shall be enlisted and enrolled under the general provisions of this act from among the citizens of Porto Rico for service in the Canal Zone or elsewhere as directed by the President."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition to add one regiment, to be recruited from the citizens of Porto Rico, to the additions to the Army provided in this bill.

We have had in Porto Rico for quite a number of years a regiment consisting of two battalions. They have rendered effective service and have repeatedly received the commendations of the War Department and the Bureau of Insular Affairs. Under the terms of this bill this regiment is increased to full three battalion strength, so that there is a small increase provided for in this bill in the Porto Rican force. However, it is understood and expected that this regiment shall remain stationed in Porto Rico. It is, in fact, a garrison regiment for that island. The proposition contained in this amendment of mine is to recruit from Porto Ricans an entire regiment, with the full organization, such as is provided in this bill, for service in the Canal Zone or elsewhere, as may be directed by the President.

It is the testimony of all of the Army officers that Porto Ricans are perhaps more easily enlisted than any other body of men subject to American jurisdiction. Porto Rico is a small island. It has a very congested population. It is smaller in area than the State of Connecticut, but it has a population of more than 1,250,000 people. The island is poor. The people there very readily enlist. They make good soldiers, as the testimony shows. It would be a benefit to them, with their congested population, to allow their citizens to enlist in a regiment in the United States Army.

They would be peculiarly qualified for service in the Canal Zone or elsewhere in the Tropics. It would be, Mr. Chairman, as I view it, of immense service and economy to the United States to do this. All of the Army officers in their official reports have repeatedly said that, in their judgment, it was bad policy to send minimized or skeleton regiments from the United States forces to service in the Tropics or to serve elsewhere without the continental territory of the United States; that it is bad from the standpoint of economy and bad also from the standpoint of efficiency. In other words, they believe that, as nearly as possible, when service is to be had outside of the territory of the United States it should be by full-strength regiments. If we should, as we easily might and ought to, under the amendment I suggest, enlist a full-strength regiment of 1,900 men in Porto Rico, we would be able to send that regiment to the Canal Zone for service, and in lieu of that withdrawal from the Canal Zone two regiments of minimum strength of soldiers from the United States. It would be of immense benefit to us, both from the standpoint of economy and from the standpoint of efficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EMERSON. Since I have been in Washington I have received some papers from Porto Rico stating that the Porto Ricans did not wish to remain under the authority of the United States and that they were not loyal to the country, but wanted independence.

Mr. TOWNER. I think that is not the fact. Generally Porto Rico has been very loyal to the United States. They desire very much closer relations with the United States, and there is a bill now reported and made privileged by which we give them a very much larger degree of self-government, and also make them citizens of the United States.

Mr. EMERSON. Is that feeling general in the island, or is it that some fellow wants to stir up trouble?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not think it is general in the island. There has been very little feeling of disloyalty, only now and then is there a sporadic attempt to stir up independence and separate government sentiment.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. BAILEY. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this increased regiment will be a charge on the Porto Rican people?

Mr. TOWNER. No; it will be economy for us, however, because we can send that regiment to the Tropics instead of our own.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman by reason of his position on the Insular Affairs Committee is familiar with the political affairs in the island. Is it not true that the prominent politicians of the island, the members of the house of delegates, and even the Delegate to this body, take the position that the island should be independent and that they are not in favor of American sovereignty?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I will say——

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the meaning of the resolution?

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman could not have received a resolution of that kind because the last resolution passed by the party to which the Delegate belongs said that they withdrew their immediate demand for independence, and approved a bill granting closer relations with the Government of the United States. They all desire a larger measure of self-government. Of course from time to time there are sporadic breakings out in the island of the independent sentiment, and especially when they see the tendency toward giving the Philippines independence evidenced here in the United States somebody stirs up that proposition down there. I think it is entirely safe to say that the great body of Porto Rico citizens, and particularly the most intelligent, those capable of judging what is for their advantage, have seen in their experience connected with the United States that their connection with us has been greatly to their advantage. They desire, and I think justly so, a larger measure of self-government and a more autonomous form of self-government, and I think we ought to give it to them.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. What is the size of the standing army that we have down there?

Mr. TOWNER. We have one short regiment.

Mr. GORDON. How many men?

Mr. TOWNER. Seven or eight hundred men.

Mr. GORDON. And the gentleman thinks it ought to be increased 1,900 more?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, no; I do not think they ought to be kept there. I think they ought to be sent to service in the Canal Zone or somewhere where they can best serve, so that American boys may not be required to go there.

Mr. GORDON. This amendment proposes to add a regiment of 1,900 men to be sent down there?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, no; it does not propose to send any troops from the United States down there, but to recruit a regiment from the citizens of Porto Rico to be used when required.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman says that the sentiment for independence down there seems to be growing.

Mr. TOWNER. No; I did not say so, and I think that is not true.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to ask the gentleman if the degree of discontent in the island does not depend somewhat on the price of sugar?

Mr. TOWNER. That I think has some influence on it. People are discontented when they are not in good financial condition.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman from Iowa is a scholar and a philosopher. Is it not a fact that when one race is subject to another that there is always protest and discontent?

Mr. TOWNER. I am neither a scholar nor a philosopher, but I think that is very often the tendency.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the amendment it is to recruit an additional regiment in Porto Rico. We have heretofore had two battalions there, and we now make it a full regiment. I think that is as far as we ought to go. It does not seem to me that the committee ought to act on a proposition of this kind without having some definite information in regard to it, and I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman stated that we now have in Porto Rico two battalions.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Any of them natives?

Mr. HAY. They are all natives, and an additional battalion which is provided for in this bill will be composed of natives.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is what I understood, but some remarks were made here about taking that regiment away and sending it elsewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling attention to a matter of which I spoke yesterday. I do so without any apology, because it is the experience of all of us in this House that when we pass a bill of a general character it is always followed within the next two or three Congresses by attempts to amend either in the way of perfecting it or not perfecting. I desire at this time to call attention, as I did yesterday, to the influence of inertia on our Military and Naval Establishments. This Porto Rican regiment is an old friend of all of us who have served here any length of time. It has been ordered abolished once or twice in my experience, and now, apparently, it is being put into the law in permanent form. I have such confidence in the committee that I assume that is correct, and I have always had a feeling that that was the proper thing to do. It illustrates, however, that if a thing just simply walks along with the Army it stays with it.

Yesterday I called attention to the lack of inventiveness among the Army officers. I am afraid I was somewhat too broad in those statements, because I recall myself two inventions that ought to be put in the RECORD in connection with that criticism. The first is the Army service rifle, invented entirely by Army officers, and the best Army service rifle that any army in the world has.

The second is a recent invention by Admiral Fiske, of our own Navy, of the most sanguinary instrument of naval warfare that has yet been invented. It has been perfected since Admiral Fiske invented it by an Italian inventor, and provides a means by which there can be dropped from aeroplanes torpedoes carrying 600 pounds of guncotton in their heads, which can be dropped from a height of a mile and a half, not directly on the ship, which would be very coarse work, but dropped so as to strike the sea a quarter of a mile or more from the ship, yet with an aim so that they hit the target eight out of ten times, and when they take the water they proceed toward the warship or the target at the rate of 90 miles an hour. That invention of Admiral Fiske, of our Navy, as perfected by the Italian, may absolutely revolutionize naval warfare. Imagine what might happen if, when the two great fleets abroad meet, as they probably will meet some time, either one of them is equipped with an attendant fleet of 600 aeroplanes, which is quite possible under modern conditions, each of those aeroplanes equipped, as they can be, with from two to five of these torpedoes, which in the aggregate would mean from twelve hundred to 3,000 torpedoes, threatening the absolutely helpless ships on the other side. The aim of war, as I said yesterday, is to kill people. It is a grim, grizzly aim, and our officers, now that war has become no longer a matter of personal prowess, but of mechanics, when they do make an invention of a character like that, deserve to have it called to the attention of the House. Inasmuch as I brought up the subject yesterday and elicited some information as to other inventions, it occurred to me that in all fairness I ought to call the attention of the House to these two inventions—the Army service rifle, which is unsurpassed in its way, and this latest perfectly terriffic instrument of warfare. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That so much of section 2 of the act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, except the first paragraph thereof, as relates to enlistment and reenlistment in the Army, be, and is hereby, amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"That on and after November 1, 1916, all enlistments in the Regular Army shall be for the term of seven years, the first three years in the service with the organizations of which those enlisting shall form a part, and, except as otherwise provided herein, the last four years on furlough and attached to the Army Reserve hereinafter provided for: Provided, That at the expiration of three years' continuous service with such organizations, either under a first or any subsequent enlistment, any soldier may be reenlisted for another period of seven years, as above provided for, in which event he shall receive his final discharge from his prior enlistment: Provided further, That for all enlistments hereafter accomplished under the provisions of this act, three years shall be counted as an enlistment period in computing continuous-service pay: Provided further, That hereafter the Army Reserve shall consist of all enlisted men who, after having served not less than three years with the organizations of which they form a part, shall receive furloughs without pay or allowances until the expiration of their terms of enlistment, together with transportation in kind and subsistence as provided for by this law in the case of discharged soldiers, but when any soldier is furloughed to the Reserve his accounts shall be closed and he shall be paid in full to the date such furlough becomes effective: Provided further, That any enlisted man, subject to good conduct and physical fitness for duty, upon his written application to that effect, shall have the right of remaining with the organization to which he belongs until the completion of his whole enlistment, without passing into the Reserve: Provided further, That, except upon reenlistment after three years' service or as now otherwise provided for by law, no enlisted man shall receive a final discharge until the expiration of his seven-year term of enlistment, including his term of service in the Army Reserve, but any such enlisted man may be reenlisted for a further term of seven years under the same conditions in the Army at large, or, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, for a term of four years in the Army Reserve; and any person who may have been discharged honorably from the Regular Army, with character reported as at least good, and who has been found physically qualified for the duties of a soldier, if not over 45 years of age, may be enlisted in the Army Reserve for a similar term of three years: And provided further, That in the event of actual or threatened hostilities the President, when so authorized by Congress, may summon all furloughed soldiers who belong to the Army Reserve to rejoin their respective organizations, and during the continuance of their service with such organizations they shall receive the pay and allowances authorized by law for soldiers serving therein, and any enlisted man who shall have reenlisted in the Army Reserve shall receive during such service the additional pay now provided by law for the soldiers of his arm of the service in their second enlistment period. Upon reporting for duty, and being found physically fit for service, they shall receive a sum equal to $5 per month for each month during which they shall have belonged to the Reserve, as well as the actual cost of transportation and subsistence from their homes to the places at which they may be ordered to report for duty under such summons."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 18, after the word "hereafter," insert the following: "except as otherwise provided by law."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 22, after the letters "dent;" strike out the words "when so authorized by Congress," and, in lines 23 and 24, strike out the words "rejoin their respective organizations" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "report for duty wherever ordered."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 14, after the word "enlistment," insert the following: "After the expiration of two years' service in a first or subsequent enlistment enlisted men serving within the continental limits of the United States may be furloughed to the Army reserve in the grade in which then serving, or may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be reenlisted for a period of seven years: Provided, however, That after the expiration of one year's honorable service any enlisted man serving within the continental limits of the United States whose company, troop, battery, or detachment commander shall report him as proficient and sufficiently trained, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be furloughed to the Army reserve, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, in which event he shall not be eligible to reenlist in the service until the expiration of his term of seven years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to reduce the enlistment period in certain cases. Under existing law that period is four years with the colors and three years with the reserves. The pending bill fixes a period of three years with the colors and four years with the reserves. The intent of the amendment is to allow an enlisted man who has served faithfully and satisfactorily for a period of one year and who, during that year, has shown proficiency as a soldier, and who is recommended by his commanding officer for a furlough into the reserves, to be furloughed into the reserves at the expiration of that one year. It is believed by those who favor the reduction of the period of enlistment that such a provision would bring to the Army a large number of splendid young men who would be willing to serve for one year for the purpose of the experience such service would give them. We believe, too, that it would materially reduce desertions. Most of these desertions in the Army come during the first year of service, and principally during the first six months of service. Many young men enlist just after they have had some little quarrel at home, or through pique, and then, after they have been in the Regular Army for a few months they get homesick. Every Regular Army officer testifies that homesickness is a prolific cause of desertion. We feel that where a man could get out of the Army in a year by close attention to duty he would be inclined to give his undivided attention to the work of the Army for the sake of getting an honorable discharge at the end of that year. He would say, "I will stick it out and get my honorable discharge rather than desert."

There is another provision in the amendment to the effect that at the end of two years a soldier could be furloughed to the reserves without any recommendation of his superior officer. In other words, if the soldier at the end of two years wants to go into the reserves he should be allowed to do so. That, too, in my judgment, would help to prevent desertions.

The testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. The preponderance of testimony before the committee was to the effect that, generally speaking, you can turn out a good soldier at the end of two years. The trouble with our Army is that it seeks to provide a life's career for the enlisted man.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I could not hear the amendment very well when read. Is there a provision in it that the soldier must be serving on the American Continent?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. He could not be in the Philippines?

Mr. KAHN. There is a provision that he must be in continental United States. The preponderance of testimony is that a good soldier can be turned out in two years. Now, the conditions in Europe to-day show that two years' service is sufficient to make a soldier. We ought not, in my judgment, to encourage young men to remain constantly in the Army of the United States. [Applause.] I think they should have the benefit of the drill, the discipline, and the training, and then they ought to be encouraged to go out into the body of the citizenship of the country. It would be better for them and it would be infinitely better, in my judgment, for the country. Of course, you must always reenlist a certain number of men in order to have good noncommissioned officers.

The latter, in the final analysis, are the very backbone of the Army, but the provisions of the bill provide for that. They provide for reenlistments, so that we will get our noncommissioned officers.

We have heard on this floor, on several occasions, of the situation that occurred in Prussia in 1808. At that time Napoleon forced upon that Kingdom a provision in the treaty of Tilsit that the total strength of the army of Prussia should be 42,000 men. It was intended to prevent a large military force in that country. Scharnhorst, who was minister of war, and Stein, who was premier, held that that provision in the treaty did not contemplate the same 42,000 men until they died, but that they could enlist constantly new men who, having received a satisfactory military training, would be a great reserve force in case the state should ever become involved in war. They carried out that provision; they drilled men for three months, for six months, for a year, and turned them back into the body of the citizens. And finally, when the Battle of Leipzig was fought, the Prussians helped to defeat the invincible Napoleon in the first great setback he encountered. They also saved the day for the allies at Waterloo on June 18, 1815. We can well afford to profit by the experience of Prussia. In our own country we ought to turn out as a reserve force as many trained men as we possibly can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. HAY. How much times does the gentleman want?

Mr. KAHN. Five minutes. I will try, if I can, to finish within that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. What this country needs to-day is a force of reserves. This amendment will give us reserves. This amendment will give us trained men. By passing enlisted men into the reserves as speedily as possible they will become a fighting force that can be used to fill up the ranks of our organizations in case the country should become involved in war.

Objection is made to this amendment principally on the ground that it will hurt the efficiency of the Army. I do not believe it will. In Germany and in countries where they have conscription one-half the men in the army come in every year as new, untried men. It does not break up their systems. On the contrary, it is helpful to them. All their reserves have had from one to two years' service. The force of men that could be turned out in our own country in the course of five or six years under a system of the kind that would be inaugurated in the United States if this amendment carries, would give us, in my judgment, over a hundred thousand men in the reserves.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am thoroughly in favor of this amendment, but will we not have to add to it the proposition that the half that come in new every year shall come in at a certain period of the year so that they can have company drill for the first three months, regimental drill for the second three months, brigade drill for the third three months, and full campaign for the fourth three months, so as to make it a real army by putting these men at work?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think such a provision is necessary in the law; that can be fixed by regulation, and not only that; this very bill provides for recruiting stations where they could be drilled in the first instance.

Mr. KONOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. KONOP. I understand it is pretty hard now to get 140,000 men under our volunteer system. If we let these men go out and do not permit them to reenlist, how does the gentleman expect to get them under the volunteer system?

Mr. KAHN. The men will not enlist at present because the law ties them up for four years. A young man just starting out in life might be willing to be tied up for one year to get the benefit of the training, but he will not tie himself up for a term of four years.

Mr. HAY. This law provides a three-year enlistment.

Mr. KAHN. He will not even tie himself up for three years. I have had young men tell me that themselves. We can get, in my judgment, if this amendment is adopted, thousands of young men who are working their way through college who will take a year's training. They feel that $15 a month pay will enable them at the end of the year to have saved approximately $150 of their salary. The Government furnishes food, clothing, and shelter. With that amount of savings they can start out on their life work with a small nest egg to tide them over the rough places for a few months. But they will not tie themselves up for three years. They will not take the chance of losing so much time at the beginning of their careers; but they will go for one year for the advantage of the training and discipline. I sincerely hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have paid as much attention to this bill touching the Army, for some little time, as a tenderfoot could. Frankly, what I do not know about what this bill will do when it is enacted in detail would make a book. Necessarily we must depend upon the committees having these important bills in charge for information, and they have not much time to inform us even under the five-minute rule.

I am going to vote for this bill, following the committee. I apprehend that when it passes it will pass substantially as reported, and as it may be amended upon the floor with the assent of the committee.

The remarks which the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has made appealed to me, because I feel that I substantially indorse what he has said. This is a peace bill, as we understand, from the report of the committee. All will agree, however, that the bill would not have been reported, and if reported would have no chance of being enacted, if it were not for the war in Europe and the Mexican situation. Now, as I listened to first one side and then the other, I concluded that I would make inquiry as to how the Union Army was constituted during the Civil War. I went to the Pension Office, and I hold in my hand a report based on a report of The Adjutant General of the ages of the people who enlisted in that great struggle on the Union side, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, March 20, 1916.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CANNON: In compliance with your verbal request of to-day, I have the honor to hand you herewith what is believed to be a correct statement of the relative ages of the men who enlisted in the Union Army during the Civil War.

Trusting that this will serve your purpose, I am,
Very truly, yours,

G. M. SALTZGABER, Commissioner.

Age at enlistment—1861–1865.

The records of the office of The Adjutant General, United States Army, show that in the War of the Rebellion the enlisted men consisted as follows:

Those 10 years and under	25
Those 11 years and under	38
Those 12 years and under	225
Those 13 years and under	300
Those 14 years and under	1,523
Those 15 years and under	104,987
Those 16 years and under	231,051
Those 17 years and under	844,891
Those 18 years and under	1,151,438
Those 21 years and under (these two classes make the total number of enlistments)	2,159,798
Those 22 years and over (these two classes make the total number of enlistments)	618,511
Those 25 years and over	46,626
Those 44 years and over	16,071

Total men enlisted 2,778,304. The estimated number of individuals in service is given as 2,213,365.

There were 1,151,000 persons under the age of 18; there were 2,159,000 under the age of 21, with the total enlistment of 2,215,000. Patriotic were those 18-year-old boys, and those under 18, and the 21-year-old boys.

I had the privilege shortly after I came to Congress as a Member of the House to dine one evening when Gen. Sheridan, Gen. Sherman, Gen. Logan, and quite a number of others were present. I did not do any talking, but I did a good job of listening. I never shall forget that Gen. Sheridan made the statement that if it had not been for the boys under 21 years of age we could not have succeeded in that great struggle. [Applause.] Some one asked him why. He said that the man of 27, 28, and 30 and 35 ordinarily had a wife and children and would not take the chances that the unmarried young man would take—who took all the chances.

Now, this bill is better than nothing, as to the National Guard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be continued for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KONOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. KONOP. If it is a fact that during the Civil War young men under 21 years, or around the age of 18, enlisted, if you have a two-year enlistment now and these young boys get out of the Army and go into private life, should war come, would they then reenlist and go into the Army after they got to be 26 or 27 years old?

Mr. CANNON. They would go in from the reserves. They would be in the reserve seven years, as it is stated, and six or seven years, I think, would be a proper term of enlistment. If I had my way, I would recommit this bill with a suggestion—and I am not criticizing the committee when I say that, for I have not knowledge enough to do it—to enlist by volunteering between the ages of 18 and 23, 50,000 young men, most of them just out of high school, just out of college, for six or seven years, one year with the colors, and then go into the reserve. [Applause.] But they say that would cost a heap of money. Yes. Granting that it is $1,000 to the soldier, it would be $50,000,000, but from the cream of the country, from the farm and factory, and high school and college, would come that 50,000 young men, the best young men we have in the country, and I take it for granted that such men at the end of 12 months would be fairly well drilled soldiers. These 50,000 would be enlisted, and after a year's service, would constitute the first reserve, and the first reserve would become the second reserve. Continuing this policy, the country would soon have a thoroughly well equipped reserve force for the public defense.

Now, I have been told, and I apprehend that it is true, that when the Civil War ended there marched down Pennsylvania Avenue the greatest Army up to that time and the most efficient Army that had ever existed, perhaps, in the history of the world. They came from the country; they came from the city. But I was told also, and I have tried to verify it, and it is not far out of the way, that with the hasty enlistment of those men, raw, uninstructed, the best raw material on earth for an army, they had to be taught; and it is more difficult to teach a man now to be a soldier than it was then. And I am told that more men, because of insanitary surroundings while being assembled and prepared for war, died from disease than were killed in actual conflict on the field of battle. And more have been pensioned for that cause than from any other.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Three to one.

Mr. CANNON. Three to one, says my friend from Mississippi. I think he is correct, but I wanted to put it mildly. So I favor this proposition from every standpoint. First, from the standpoint of all the great burdens that this country has to bear in the future, with Monroe doctrine, and the taking possession of San Domingo, Haiti, and Nicaragua, and other portions of this continent, we must be prepared for the work. And then there are the Sandwich Islands, the Panama Canal, and the Philippines. Oh, the Philippines. We have them. By the treaty made by President McKinley and ratified by the Senate and the help of Mr. William Jennings Bryan, we have the Philippines, and will have the Philippines longer than any of us live; having put our hands to the plow, we will not look back. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I believe that there are two principal reasons why we do not get enlistments. One is that we do not pay our soldiers enough and the other is the term of enlistment is too long. I am perfectly well aware that the experts of the War Department do not agree with me in that last proposition at all. I have formed my opinion by talking to a good many enlisted men and to a few reservists.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have heard all these stories about the enormous number of men being enlisted in Chicago and elsewhere in consequence of the resolution which we passed the other day increasing the Regular Army by 20,000 men. What are the facts? The Adjutant General has prepared for me a statement showing the actual number of enlistments up to noon yesterday; the actual number of acceptances since we increased the Army by 20,000 the other day, four working-days of enlisting and one Sunday having intervened. He gave me complete figures of what had actually been accomplished up to noon yesterday. How many recruits do you suppose had actually been accepted? Five hundred and fifty-five men, and all the rest who had applied had been rejected. That is what has actually happened.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. How many had applied?

Mr. GARDNER. I do not know exactly how many have applied. I believe that they were less than 2,700, but the gentleman can get the exact number by calling up Col. P. C. March, of The Adjutant General's Office. The figure which I have given, however, does not include recruits secured at the Los Angeles station. There is no report from that station. There are, however, reports from 53 out of our 54 recruiting stations, so that the figures are substantially complete. There are 54 recruiting stations in the United States. Some have branches opened from time to time. The opening of 170 branches has been authorized, but the order has not yet been carried out from lack of time to do it. However, recruiting parties have been sent out in the territory covered by those branches, and 555 accepted recruits has been the net result for the whole country, leaving out Los Angeles.

Just bear that in mind that in this country, in this flurry going on over the Mexican situation, men are so reluctant to enlist that only 555 have been accepted, leaving out what has been done at Los Angeles.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Do we understand from that statement that all the rest had been rejected?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes. That is what Col. March told me in the last 15 minutes over the telephone; that is, of those who had applied up to noon yesterday.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] does just this: It says that if the commanding officer of any young man makes up his mind after a year that that young man has learned all that is necessary for him to learn as a soldier, he may say, "We release you from the Regular Army if you want to go, and you can remain in the reserve. You have got to be in the reserve six years, however."

Now, then, the Kahn amendment goes further. Supposing the commanding officer says, "Young man, I shall not recommend you for the reserve. You are enlisted for three years with the colors and I do not think you know enough for me to consider your military education satisfactory." In that case, what does this amendment do? It provides that at the end of two years the young man can come forward and claim the right to be transferred into the reserve. In the reserve he must stay five years if he has been discharged from the colors at the end of two years. That is precisely what is proposed by the Kahn amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAY. One moment. Mr. Chairman, if there is any more debate desired on this proposition—how much does the gentleman want?

Mr. KEATING. Five minutes.

Mr. HAY. I will ask, Mr. Chairman, that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 25 minutes——

Mr. HAY. Of which I ask to control 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Of which the gentleman from Virginia asks to control 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that it be made 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is too late. The Chair put the question, and it has been agreed to. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] is recognized.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

I was very much impressed by what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] said as to why we failed to get men in the Army. He stated that, first of all, we did not pay our soldiers enough, and then he stated that the term of enlistment was too long. Perhaps both reasons are good, but there is a third reason, in my judgment, which the gentleman did not refer to, and that is the feeling with a great many of the red-blooded American boys that they can not join the Regular Army without sacrificing their self-respect.

In that connection I want to read briefly to the House an article that I consider the sanest article on this question of national defense that has appeared in any magazine. It is from the pen of Will Irwin, who by many is regarded as the greatest journalist in this country. He has had experience on the battle fronts of Europe. This article was contributed to the issue of January 1, 1916, of the Saturday Evening Post and is entitled: "Common sense about preparedness." I quote from Mr. Irwin's article:

Now, our Army system, in so far as discipline is concerned, has been studied from the British and Germans rather than from the French. It seems to my superficial civilian viewpoint that it approaches nearest to the British. No one needs to be told of the social gulf that separates our officers from our privates. A West Point diploma confers on an officer a brand of Army aristocracy. It is, of course, an artificial aristocracy. Congressmen have grown so tired of the jealousies arising from West Point and Annapolis appointments that in most districts the matter is left to a competitive examination, wherein the son of the humblest laborer is as likely to "get in" as the son of the proudest aristocrat. Four years of West Point, and the ditch-digger's son stands a wide gulf apart from the wheat-shoveler's son, brought up next door, who has happened to enlist as a private. It is true that the trained and experienced West Pointer who has kept garrison in the far West, hunted Igorots in the Philippines, and governed towns in the Southern Islands gets over a deal of that. Veterans of our Philippine war testify that the recent Volunteer appointment was often far more an aristocrat than the old Regular. Parvenus become everywhere more insistent on their position than the established. But the rule holds, nevertheless, and for proof consider the furor just before this war when a son of a post tailor got an appointment to West Point. He had served as a common soldier—that was the trouble. And yet the present head of the French Army is the son of a cooper and a vinedresser!

Without question much of our trouble in getting enlistments for the Regular Army is due to this system. The Briton of humble occupation has been brought up to regard himself as "lower class." He accepts cheerfully a position of social inferiority—he even expects it, and feels lost unless some gentleman is exalted above him. When he enters the army he needs no change of attitude at all.

CASTE IN THE ARMY.

The average American of humble occupation has been brought up to regard himself as the equal of anyone. He hates any position in life which marks him off as socially inferior. How many native white Americans are working at domestic service? For an American to enter the Army—it is a big change. Tell him that he will do better on the whole at soldiering than at common labor, and he will answer in effect that he is no man's lackey. To create real enthusiasm for the Army we need to study the French system. It is true that conscription, as practiced by the French, has been a great leveler. There, of recent years, no able-bodied young man has been exempt. The son of the richest or the noblest man in France, if he has not chosen the profession of officer, has had to do his two years of service in the ranks with the son of his butler, his butcher, or his tenant. But even without this, the French, having a passion for equality, would probably have found some other way to keep the system democratic. It is true also that the French are a homogeneous people, all much alike in their ways and the cut of their ideas, while we are of all sorts. But I am not advocating the adoption of the French system in toto, only an adaptation suited to our national character, which is still democratic.

Now, Mr. Chairman, time will not permit me to quote further that portion of the article which bears directly upon this issue, but I want to say to the Members of this House that if you want an Army in this country, you must make it such an organization as the American boy can enter with self-respect. You must democratize your Army.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PADGETT). The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD a further quotation from this article.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the extract referred to:

Most of the present agitation centers round the Army; and this is sensible. We have already a fleet ranked from fourth to second among the navies of the world. Though it has probably a great many flaws, it is quite a simple matter to increase it at the will of the people and the Government. The Army is quite another matter. The little British force which held the left of the allied line at the retreat from the Belgian border is mentioned often as insignificant in this war of great numbers. Yet, as the best we could do, we could muster no more trained troops than that to resist a sudden invasion. Perhaps it is as well. Warfare has changed in the past two years, as it had not changed for a century before; and we have so much the less antiquated machinery and method to scrap. In West Point, with its thorough and businesslike training, we have a fine nucleus for an efficient new Army; and sometimes I think that is all we have—except a Nation that has known no war for a generation, and is therefore hard and strong.

Almost a new start—if our military experts can be made to see it that way. The soldier clan, however, is everywhere conservative; war brings a kind of vermiform appendix in the body politic. The European officers have been close up against competition of the fiercest kind. Whenever Germany introduced an improvement, France, in peril of invasion any month, was forced to follow; and wherever France introduced an improvement, Germany followed. Here, however, there has been no such competition. I may be mistaken, but I think that the average officer in the American Army tends to view the present Army scheme as the only feasible scheme, just because it is the thing he has known all his life.

There is, for example, the important question of discipline. The Canadian troops are very largely westerners, and indistinguishable, except for their uniforms, from our own western cattlemen and miners. When they first appeared in England the Little British held up their hands in horror at the Canadian "lack of discipline." These colonials were familiar with their officers—personally familiar. Officers and privates were caught drinking together at bars, and reprimanded therefor. They were careless about salutes. It was commonly, although perhaps erroneously, reported that they were kept from the line for fear they would ruin discipline among the native troops. However, a few brigades of them got to the line at last; and two weeks later, while they were still "raw troops," fate called upon them to plug a broken line after the gas attack at second Ypres. What they did, what magnificent efficiency and valor they showed, the world knows. Their main body went into action 12,000 strong. They emerged 6,000 strong. They saved the day. The only criticism the Little British had to offer was that they were too brave.

"They've made amends for their lack of discipline," said a rather hidebound British captain one day in Boulogne. I was about to take him up when a staff officer of wide experience and observation answered for me.

"They do have discipline," he said, "only we haven't seen it, because it isn't our kind. Every nation must work out its own system, and your system won't suit the other fellow. Do you suppose we could make a go of it on French lines? And what would a Frenchman do under our system? Most likely tell his officer to go to—Berlin. They have discipline, I tell you, but not our kind."

There was a sermon for us—every nation must find its own characteristic way with its troops. The German has been bred to a love of absolute authority. It is right and reasonable to act without question and on the instant. It is good to "respect the uniform." There is, to the German, a patriotic thrill in making way for a group of officers as they stride down the sidewalk The German system, in short, fits the German character.

Just so British methods fit the British character. The idea of class is inherent with most Englishmen. The middle-class Briton has a way of saying that the class system is broken. It is for him, perhaps, but with the upper class and the lower it still keeps its force. Now it has been taken as axiomatic that the British Army must be officered only by gentlemen—in the English sense of the word. Lower-class privates, as a general rule, will follow none other. They want a gentleman for a leader, and they expect him to live up to the canons of his class. Should he grow too familiar with them, then he is no gentleman, and unfit for leadership. It has many subtleties, this class system. For example, the officer must lead, he must take his risks with the men. It is true that the class system is breaking down a little under the terrible pressure of Armageddon. Men of all classes are coming up from the ranks and are getting obeyed. But what I have just described is probably still the general rule.

FRENCH DISCIPLINE A TRIUMPH OF DEMOCRACY.

The French method is totally different. We have a great deal to learn from the French about democracy. For all that they still have a monarchist party and a few unrecognized and unprivileged titles, they are probably the finest flower of democracy the world ever saw. And in France there is no social gulf between man and officer. To-night, if one should drop into the cafés of the French towns held by the reserve, he would find officers drinking sour wine and playing dominoes with private soldiers. Nothing in rules or custom prevents the French captain from asking one of his privates to dinner. The officer is a kind of shift boss, whom the men follow in action because he has been chosen to lead, and it is all for the Republic. "A private soldier," said an American officer recently, "must obey instantly and without thinking." That is not the theory of the French Army. The private is encouraged to think. Before action the colonel gets the general plan of battle along with his own orders. He passes it on to the company officers. The company officer calls his men about him. "Now, mes enfants," he says, "such and such is what our corps is going to do to-day. Thus and so is our part." Then he explains in detail. "Keep your heads, my children," he finishes; "remember—and think. Allons—pour la Patrie!"

Promotion in war time goes absolutely on a basis of merit. No one asks what Jean was in civil life. There is but one question: Can Jean command? I know of butchers, small clerks, vintners, and carpenters who entered this war as privates and have already risen as high as the rank of captain or even of major.

This system would be impossible with the Germans, but it works with the French as none other would. Not that they have no formal discipline. Read the rules printed in that little army record book which every Frenchman carries as a passport, and you find the words "punishment—death" staring at you from section after section. But they need no race of superior beings to hold them to the job. "La Patrie"—that is enough.

The French and the Germans are admittedly the big leaguers of this army game. The British may get into their class in time, for the British human material is fine, but that time has not yet arrived. Given an equal number of Frenchmen and Germans, with equal equipment and resources, and it would be hard to pick a winner. Each of these nations has worked out its discipline on lines suited to the national character. With the Germans it is a triumph of autocracy and bureaucracy; with the French it is a great triumph of democracy.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as this bill now stands, it ought to be termed "A bill to reduce enlistments and prevent the formation of a reserve."

We have tried this system. We have tried it for years. Year after year it has proved a failure. It will prove a failure still.

You talk about increasing the Army by this bill. Where are you going to get the men? How are you going to get them? What is there in the experience of the past that would lead any man to believe that you are going to get the men provided for under the terms of this bill? Will they join the Army even under the encouragement of some kind of expedition or war, whichever you call it, now going on down in Mexico? The remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] indicate that they will not enlist.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The term of enlistment now is four years. Under the terms of this bill we propose to reduce it to three years. In the face of the conditions now existing in the country, does not the gentleman think it well to draw it out for one or two years?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No. If the gentleman will let me proceed, I will attempt to point out why I do not think so.

Mr. GARDNER. Can not the fourth year be served in the reserve?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; it can; but under the terms of this amendment, as I understand it, that is not obligatory.

What young man is there who wants to put in three of the best years of his life absolutely and unconditionally with the Army? What will he be good for after he has put in those three years in the Army? We all know that he will be good for nothing else except to continue in the Army; and how many young men have we got who want to make $15 a month, and service under the conditions which the gentleman who last spoke before me [Mr. KEATING] described, their chief ambition in life? Those that we have are fit for nothing else, and there are very few of them. How many of the Members of this House, advising any young men of their acquaintance, would say to them, "Under this bill as it now stands I would advise you to enlist in the Regular Army and take three years of experience"? But if that term is shortened, as it is in the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], so that only one year need necessarily be passed in the service, we are not only building up our reserves, but we are encouraging young men to enlist, because there are a great many of them who would like to take a short course in military instruction, and the experience that they would get in traveling around, and there are other hopes that would induce them to enlist for a short period; but when they are absolutely compelled to serve for three years, they will not enter the Army under such conditions.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I have the time.

Mr. PLATT. I agree with the gentleman thoroughly as to this amendment and expect to vote for it; but it seems to me an extreme statement that a man who serves three or four years in the United States Army is fit for nothing else. There are 250,000 men who have passed through the Regular Army in 10 years, and certainly they are all working, and probably better off because they have served in it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not mean that in the strictly literal sense. I meant that a young man who had spent that time in the Army could not hope to reach any very advanced position in life afterwards.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think that is true.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think it is.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the gentleman know that more than 50 per cent of the desertions are in the first six months?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; I do; and I know it is because they have got three years or more ahead of them. That is the reason why they desert.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I am very heartily in favor of this amendment. I think everyone who has read the statements of the officers of the Army who were before both the House and Senate committees has wondered at the somewhat singular position which those officers have taken. Most of them believe in a seven-year term of enlistment. Most of them believe in three or four years of service with the colors; and yet such men as Gen. Wood, the ex-Chief of Staff, and Gen. Scott, the present Chief of Staff of the Army, admit that with intensive service a man may become an efficient soldier within six months' time; that any man with one year's service with the colors may become an efficient soldier. Yet most of them say that he must be kept two or three years more in active service with the colors.

What we need, Mr. Chairman, is not so much a large standing army, as a large, efficient, and always ready reserve in cases of emergency. It is that which will bring about the condition of preparedness that this country needs and that the people demand. It is that which we should endeavor first of all to provide. If we retain, as we do in this bill, the old long-term enlistment system, our reserves will be as difficult to obtain as they have been in the past.

The figures given by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] show that under our present form of enlistment it will be practically impossible for us to enlist 40,000 volunteers for the service. We all know that the longer the service with the colors, the more disinclined is the young man of character and ambition to enter voluntarily into it. It may be that the gentlemen of the Army, believing in compulsory service, desire to show that under the conditions that exist volunteering will not be brought about, and therefore it will be easy for them to secure a system of compulsory military service. Compulsory military service has the approval of but few of our people. It is obnoxious to our institutions. It is not in harmony with our traditions or ideals. It is our duty to create as rapidly as possible an effective reserve for use in cases of emergency. This can not be done, in my judgment, under the provisions of this bill. I shall support any proposition that will bring about this enlargement of the reserve just as soon as possible. I shall be glad to vote for any provision that will make enlistments attractive to the youth of the Nation, so that they will be prompt in offering their services under this enlargement plan. I shall be glad to vote for any proposition that will give to us now, when we most need it and when the people most demand it, a large and efficient reserve for use in emergencies. In my judgment, the adoption of this amendment will help materially to that. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, if the committee desires to destroy the efficiency of the United States Army it will adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. If this amendment is adopted, it means a two-year term of enlistment, and it therefore means that you will have in the Army, when you need an Army, not men who are trained and fit for service and fit to meet the enemy, but men who, more than half of them, have been in the Army only from one day to one year. What are you going to do with the 13,000 or 15,000 men whom you send to the Philippines every year? By the time you get those men recruited and get them over to the Philippines they will not have been there six months before they will have to turn around and come back.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. This amendment especially excludes the men in the insular possessions. It refers to those in continental United States.

Mr. HAY. But you can not exclude the men in the insular possessions, for the reason that you do not propose to enlist men for service in the insular possessions. You propose to apply this to all of the Army; and where is your force of men to send to the insular possessions with a longer enlistment than two years under this amendment? You will not have them. The result, as I say, will be that you will be sending men to the Philippines and to Hawaii and to Panama whom you will have to bring back about as soon as they have fairly reached there and begun their service.

This is an offshoot of the ideas of gentlemen who believe in the German system. They forget that we have not compulsory military service in this country. We can not turn the Army of this country into a training school. We can not have men brought into the Army for the sole purpose of training them. We propose under this bill to have an efficient Army, and you will not have an efficient Army unless you have a longer term of enlistment than two years. Three years is a term as short as it ought to be. Carry out your argument—what is the use of having officers in the Army from the time they graduate until they are 64 years of age? Why not say these officers shall only remain a certain length of time in the Army? You say you want a school for officers; you could not get a better school than the Army of the United States. Why not, therefore, pass them through just like you want to do these men and turn them out into the reserve? You will not do it, for when the time comes for action and when you need efficient officers you would not have them.

More than that, I do not suppose anybody now cares anything about the cost, but it would cost twice as much to have a two-year enlistment as the present law and one-third more under the law that we propose, which is to cut down the enlistment service from four years to three years. It seems to me to be enough to meet all the demands as to a proper reserve.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. What is the reason that induced the committee to reduce the period of enlistment from four years to three years?

Mr. HAY. It reduced the period of enlistment upon the suggestion that it would be better to have three years than four years, because they vainly believe, in my opinion, that they can get more men. I do not believe you will get a single man more under the two-year enlistment than you do under the three-year, or more under the three-year than under the four-year enlistment. Under the four-year enlistment you got all the men you wanted. Recruiting was going on all right. There was no trouble about it. The Chief of Staff and the Assistant Chief of Staff and the late Secretary of War, every one of them, opposed the short-term enlistment for the Regular Army. The Chief of Staff and the Assistant Chief of Staff are men who have served for a long time in the Army and are opposing this proposition. They know, as soldiers, that you can not have an efficient Army with a short-term enlistment; and, as I say, you are not going to get any more men, you are not going to get a single man more by the two-year enlistment than you do under the three-year term. They talk about young men just out of college who would be glad to go into the Army to serve two years. Where are the young men just coming out of the college who will be glad to do this? I have never heard of them. I have heard people talk about them, but I have never known anything of them. We provide in this bill two methods which will provide for the training of the graduates from the colleges of the country. We provide for a summer camp and we provide for the National Guard. These are the two agencies which will take in the young men who come from the colleges of the country, and the class of men that you get for the Regular Army will be the same class that you get now, I do not care whether you have one, two, or three years as the term of enlistment.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. How about the noncommissioned officers in the Army, and how essential are they to the efficiency of the Army?

Mr. HAY. I am very glad that the gentleman asked me that question. Every officer you ask will tell you that the noncommissioned officers are the backbone of the Army; that upon them depends the efficiency of the Army. Under the two-year plan you will never have an efficient noncommissioned force.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Are not the most of the noncommissioned officers reenlisted men who make it their life business, and whom a two or three year term would not affect one way or the other?

Mr. HAY. No; if you have a two-year term of enlistment and carry out the theory of it, you are going to discourage reenlistment. That is the argument that is used by Gen. Wood, who is in favor of this proposition. His argument is that there should be no reenlistment except for noncommissioned officers, but how are you going to frame a law by which you can say that a man can reenlist if he reaches the position of a corporal or sergeant?

Mr. KAHN. In the body of the section he is permitted to reenlist if he so desires.

Mr. HAY. If he so desires, but after you have a man in two years he must go out into the reserve.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not "must go."

Mr. HAY. Yes; that is the term of the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. If he desires to go into the reserve at the end of two years, he is furloughed into the reserve.

Mr. HAY. There is no way for a man to enlist as a noncommissioned officer. If he reenlists, he would have to enlist as a private and take his chance for promotion.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Under the amendment and the provisions of the bill, would it be possible for a man to enlist and remain in the service three years and at the end of that time reenlist?

Mr. HAY. Not under the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HAY. I will read the amendment.

Provided, however, That after the expiration of one year's honorable service any enlisted man serving within the continental limits of the United States—

And I want to call attention there that you are discriminating against a man serving in the insular possessions. You are holding men in who are serving in the insular possessions and doing the hardest work of the Army—whose company, troop, battery, or detachment commander shall report him as proficient and sufficiently trained, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be furloughed to the Army Reserve under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, in which event he shall not be eligible to reenlist in the service until the expiration of his term of seven years.

They may be furloughed, of course. The word "may" will be construed as "shall."

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. HAY. What do you do with them; suppose that the Secretary of War says that he will not furlough a man at the end of two years?

Mr. MANN. He is required to.

Mr. HAY. That is what I say; he is required to furlough them; he is required to terminate it at the end of two years.

Mr. MANN. No; unless the man applies for it.

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KAHN), there were—ayes 87, noes 102.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. KAHN and Mr. HAY were appointed to act as tellers.

The committee again divided and the tellers reported—ayes 108, noes 113.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. As all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto has been concluded, naturally the committee will want to hear any amendments that may be offered.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it was my understanding that debate was simply concluded upon the amendment that has just been rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken about that. The order of the committee was that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto shall be closed. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out the period after the word "summons," in line 11, page 28, and inserting in lieu thereof a colon, and adding after said colon the following:

"And provided further, That any person who served at any time in the Volunteer Army in the Civil War and has heretofore served as captain in the Philippine Scouts and has since been retired as an enlisted man and whose time of actual service in the Regular and Volunteer forces of the United States shall aggregate more than 40 years and whose aggregate of services, together with certificates of merit and honorable service, when computed as provided by existing law for the retirement of enlisted men, shall amount to not less than 50 years, may, upon nomination by the President and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be placed upon the retired list of the Army as a captain of Infantry in recognition of his long and efficient service in the Army."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 26, by inserting, after the word "for," in line 9, the following:

"Provided, That after the expiration of one year's honorable service any enlisted man of the Regular Army, whose company, troop, battery, or detachment commander shall report him as proficient and sufficiently trained, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be furloughed to the Regular Army reserve, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, in which event he shall not be eligible to reenlist in the service until the expiration of his term of seven years."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order that the proposition has already been voted upon by the committee.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Chair to compare the two amendments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the point of order clearly is not well taken. The amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] was to amend the provision in the section itself covering several questions, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is a proviso to the section covering a portion of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California and providing something in addition thereto. While the two amendments are along the same line, those who vote for one in the main may well vote for the other and still one might vote against one of the amendments and in favor of the other, preferring the language of the other. It is not for the Chair or the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] to determine just how the committee may perfect a section which is under consideration.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment differs so essentially from the other in one respect that under that other amendment enlisted men could be furloughed to the reserves, whether their captains approved or not, at the end of two years. This entirely omits that provision and makes it absolutely essential that in any event there shall be the approval of the commanding officer.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have not been able to obtain the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and I am therefore not in a position to point out to the Chair wherein the two are the same, or the same in substance. I can say, however, that in the amendment offered by the gentleman from California the same provision for the furlough of a soldier at the end of one year was provided for as is provided for by the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. There may be some difference in terms, but the substance is practically the same.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will take the House Manual and turn to page 192 he will see that under the decisions of the House if there is a change of even a single word, following the ruling of Mr. Speaker Blaine, it is not for the Chair to pass upon the competence of the amendment, but that is for the House. So long as the amendment is not identical, then the House has the right to say whether it will accept or reject, and, with all due respect, it is not within the province of the Chair. That has been held time and time again in the provisions cited under section 459 of the House Manual.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARDNER) there were—ayes 87, noes 88.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. KAHN and Mr. HAY were appointed to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 128, noes 117.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That, except as otherwise specifically provided by this act, the increases in the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Regular Army provided for by said act shall be made in four annual increments, beginning July 1, 1916, which shall be, for each branch of the service concerned, as nearly equal as practicable. Officers promoted to vacancies created or caused by the addition of the first increment shall be promoted to rank from July 1, 1916, and those promoted to vacancies created or caused by the addition of the second increment to rank from July 1, 1917, and those promoted to vacancies created or caused by the addition of the third increment to rank from July 1, 1918, and those promoted to vacancies created or caused by the addition of the fourth increment to rank from July 1, 1919.

Vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant created or caused by this act shall be filled by appointment in the following order: (1) Of cadets graduated from the United States Military Academy; (2) of commissioned officers of the National Guard between the ages of 21 and 30 years; (3) of enlisted men whose fitness for promotion shall have been determined by competitive examination; (4) of members of the officers' reserve corps who shall have been commissioned therein from the cadet companies hereinafter provided for; and (5) of candidates from civil life between the ages of 21 and 27 years; and the President is authorized to make the necessary rules and regulations to carry these provisions into effect: Provided, That hereafter all appointments of persons other than graduates of the United States Military Academy to the grade of second lieutenant in the Regular Army shall be provisional for a period of two years, at the close of which period such appointments shall be made permanent if the appointee shall have demonstrated, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, their suitability and moral, professional, and physical fitness for such permanent appointment, but should any appointee fail so to demonstrate his suitability and fitness, his appointment shall terminate; and should any officer become eligible for promotion to a vacancy in a higher grade and qualify therefor before the expiration of two years from the date of his original appointment, he shall receive a provisional appointment in such higher grade, which shall be made permanent when he shall have qualified for permanent appointment upon the expiration of two years from the date of his original appointment, or shall terminate if he shall fail so to qualify: Provided further, That appointments to the grade of second lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers shall continue to be made as now provided by law, including this act: And provided further, That the laws applicable to officers of the Regular Army and relating to examinations for promotion and to retirement on account of incapacity for active service shall be applicable to officers serving under temporary appointments as herein provided.

Officers appointed to original vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant created or caused by this act shall take lineal and relative rank according to dates of appointment: Provided, That the lineal and relative rank of second lieutenants appointed on the same date shall be determined under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided further, That The Adjutant General of the Army shall, under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of War, obtain, compile, and keep continually up to date all obtainable information as to the names, ages, addresses, occupations, and qualifications for appointment as commissioned officers of the Army, in time of war or other emergency, of men of suitable ages who, by reason of having received military training in civilian educational institutions or elsewhere, or for other sufficient reasons, may be regarded as qualified and available for appointment as such commissioned officers.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 10, after the figure "4," strike out the words "of members of the officers' reserve corps who shall have been commissioned therein from the cadet companies hereinafter provided for" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Such honor graduates of distinguished colleges as are now or may hereafter be entitled to preference by general orders of the War Department."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 2, after the word "nineteen," insert:
"Provided, That when, in his judgment, war becomes imminent, the President is authorized to organize immediately the entire increase authorized by this act, or so much of said increase as he may deem necessary."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment except that it is provided for in section 1 of the bill.

Mr. KAHN. I read section 1 of the bill pretty closely, and I am inclined to think that it does not cover the situation.

Mr. HAY. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 8, after the figure "3" following the word "years," insert the words "or commissioned officer of the Philippine Constabulary and Philippine Scouts between the ages of 21 and 35 years."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to make available in this enlarged army some of the most capable young men America has produced; men who not only have actual capability, who not only have been educated, but who have been thoroughly trained in the practical experience of Army life. I have had compiled a few figures relative to the personnel of the constabulary and scouts; and while there is, of course, no time now to give a full account of these men, as to where they come from, yet a suggestion may be helpful. The Philippine Constabulary is a native organization for military and police purposes, officered in great part by American youth. I find that the system under which these officers have been selected is as follows: Each of the military departments of the leading institutions of learning in the United States has recommended about three of their best and most efficient graduates as regards their military proficiency of the graduating class of that year. From these parties thus recommended over the country the best have been picked out; later they are subjected to examination and the cream of them commissioned as Philippine Constabulary. I believe that the institutions from which these young men have come cover the United States pretty thoroughly. They come particularly from the South, for instance, the University of Georgia, Gordon College, the University of Louisiana, the University of Florida. Nearly every great institution of the South has sent a quota of these men. Also the leading universities of the North likewise have sent their men.

Now, it is not for us to determine at this particular hour what is going to be the future of the Philippine Islands, but one thing before us is, where we are going to get the best young men for officers in the enlarged Army. Therefore, after we have filled these vacancies by utilizing the graduates of West Point and the commissioned officers of the National Guard, I ask you to give to these men, these splendid young men who know the business, who are capable and trained in it, who, provided they pass the required examination, be given a commission. [Applause.] Now, what has been said of the constabulary can in a measure be said of the scout officers. The scouts, of course, form an organization of the United States. The enlisted men are enlisted as a part of the Regular Army of the United States. The officers are nearly all taken from the United States Regular Army. Most of the men, and I find there are 133 of this class who have commissions of captain or under, were noncommissioned officers in the Regular Army at the outset. That is they apply to this class which is provided for later on in this bill, a class of men who by their proficiency, by their earnestness, by their study, showed their proficiency to the extent they were allowed to take the required examination, and having passed the same, received commissions as lieutenants or captains in the Philippine Scouts. Now, I think this class of men who during the years past demonstrated their efficiency and by their own application thereafter achieved the position of commissioned officer, ought to have the right as American citizens to take this examination and if possible secure commissions. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that by adopting this amendment and granting to these two classes of officers, tried, trained, and splendid, we will place in the American Army a small group of officers of the very first class.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I merely want to ask the gentleman as to the personnel of the Philippine Scouts. The gentleman has just told us about their being graduates of certain universities.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Not the scouts; I spoke of the constabulary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I desire to ask the gentleman if he met the personnel of the Philippine Scouts?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman mean the enlisted men or the officers?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The officers.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I met practically all of the officers of the Philippine Scouts in the actual field; yes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The gentleman spoke of their being graduates of the universities of the South?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Not of the scouts, although some of them are.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The information I am after is this, and perhaps the gentleman may know: Had any of these men in either of those branches served in our Military or Naval Academies?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can answer that two or three in the constabulary have; none in the scouts.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. What was their history in the Military and Naval Academies? That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is it the purpose of the gentleman's inquiry to learn why they are not now in the Regular Army?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. That is about it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There are none in the scouts who ever were in either the Military Academy or the Naval Academy. In the constabulary I find there are two, but they were not Americans; they are both Filipinos, and by the term of their service in the Military Academy they went back to the constabulary. These men are not tin soldiers, they are not parlor soldiers. They are men who have performed as strenuous, as efficient, and as capable work as was ever performed by any officer or a soldier under the sun. They have not hesitated to go where the sun was hot, where the storms were mighty, where danger was thick, and they have been there most of the time, and, so far as my information goes, everyone now in the force is a selected, picked man.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, as a rule these men come up from civil life, do they not?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In the scouts and in the constabulary, too.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I see that the gentleman fixes the age as between 21 and 35 years. Would not the limit of 35 years differentiate from other paragraphs of this bill, which fixes another limit?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is in part true, and yet I find the bill differentiates itself in different paragraphs. For instance, the commissioned officers of the National Guard can take an examination between the ages of 21 and 30, and in another paragraph of the bill it is between 21 and 28 years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it a legal hindrance, or is it remoteness from the place of examination?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Not at all. I find quite a number of the men, some we would most want, can not quite come in under 30, but they can come in under 35. Now, they would number, I should assume, 50 or 60 or 70, maybe 100, all told, but they are splendid material. The officers of the constabulary, I think, would nearly all come under 30.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not true that the service required of the officers of the scouts and the constabulary is the same character of service that is performed by the officers of the Regular Army in the Philippine Islands to-day?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Precisely. That is absolutely true of the scouts. Now, it may be interesting to know that during the last two or three years the Regular Army of the United States—I mean that part of the Regular Army of the United States in the Philippines—has been concentrated almost entirely in the central part of Luzon. There are no Regular Army troops in the Moro country to-day. All of the troops in the Moro country are scout troops and constabulary, but officered by these men. They are on duty 24 hours out of every day, pretty nearly. It is not quite true, perhaps, to say that the constabulary officers and men are doing exactly the same work as the Regular Army, but they are doing that which requires great capacity, discretion, and sound judgment, and, in my mind, would make exceedingly valuable officers in any army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended three minutes. I want to ask a question.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have been generous as to time, and this is not a matter of enough importance to take the time of the House. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that general debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is closed. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, if anybody desires to be heard in favor of this proposition, I yield to him five minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition only to ask a question.

Mr. HAY. All right. I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. To page 29, line 10, the gentleman offered an amendment which was adopted, striking out all of that fourth provision and inserting something else. Was it the gentleman's idea to eliminate the officers of the reserve corps altogether from opportunity to be preferred and appointed to the position of second lieutenant?

Mr. HAY. That is the effect of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Was not that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia himself?

Mr. HAY. No, sir. The amendment was offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]. I have not offered any amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Well, an amendment was offered here and voted on a few moments ago which did that very thing—to strike out No. 4. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is to insert on line 8 and before No. 3.

Mr. HAY. That was to provide for the undergraduates of certain distinguished schools, and this fourth class now in the bill probably ought not to be there, because we are going to do away with the cadet companies, which are provided for later on.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] will not be agreed to. That amendment was considered by the committee, and the committee thought that it was not a wise one.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield there? I intended to state that by reason of my becoming interested in this so late I did not have opportunity to present it to the committee as fully as I desired; and was it not at the last meeting of the committee, and the committee did not occupy more than a moment or two?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman appeared before the committee and presented his case.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman having in charge the bill tell the committee what the real objections are to this amendment, please?

Mr. HAY. In the first place, it raises the age. It puts a man in the Army who is 35 years of age as a second lieutenant, which is not good administration. The age limit now in all cases is 21 to 27, except in the case of enlisted men of the Army, who have had service in the Army. To put a man as a lieutenant in the Army at 35 years of age is not a good thing for the Army, and not a good thing for himself except for the purpose of drawing pay. And these people who are officers of the the Philippine Scouts are noncommissioned officers, generally speaking, in the Regular Army. A man who is a sergeant, for example, is made a lieutenant of the Philippine Scouts and remains in that position for some time. He is generally a man 30 years of age when he gets the appointment.

As to the constabulary, that can come in under the head of section 5. The constabulary of the Philippine Islands is not under the Government of the United States; they are under the island government, and not under our Government at all. And while some of them are college men, yet, so far as we are concerned, they are civilians, and they can come in under section 5, which provides that civilians may be examined for the position of second lieutenant.

Mr. BRITTEN. Provided, of course, their age does not interfere with their going into the service?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman will permit just a very brief statement, I want to say that I know from personal observation that officers in the Philippine Scouts, whether they have come from the enlisted personnel of the United States Army or not, are doing very efficient work, and if it is possible to get them into the United States Army at this time, or within the next year or two, I should imagine it would be very advisable.

Now, with reference to the constabulary force in the Philippines, it is true they have no connection with the United States Army or Government, but the work they are doing under American officers is more hazardous than the work that our own officers and men are doing, because they are dealing with the Moro situation almost exclusively; and if we can get that type of men into our service it will be doing good, I should think.

Mr. HAY. There is nothing to prevent men in the constabularly of proper age from coming in, nor in the case of the scout officers, because they are really enlisted men in the Army. You do not want to get men who are too old to come in as commissioned officers. They do not perform the services as they ought.

Mr. BRITTEN. I agree with the gentleman; but a great many young American officers connected with the scouts and constabulary in the Philippine Islands have been in the service a number of years. They may be just above the age prescribed in the bill. Does not the gentleman think there might be some way by which these men could be admitted if it is desired?

Mr. HAY. I do not think you could arrange the age limit simply to suit individual cases. The gentleman's amendment proposes 35 years as the age limit. There might be a man of 35 years and 1 day, and yet under the gentleman's amendment he could not come in. Just because a man is efficient and because you want him is no reason why you should enact a general law to take care of individual cases.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does not the gentleman think some credit should be given to these Americans in the Philippines for their long services there?

Mr. HAY. I think so; but they get credit, too.

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not think they get credit in this bill.

Mr. HAY. Yes; I think they get all the necessary credit that they are entitled to.

Mr. BRITTEN. I hope the amendment will carry.

Mr. HAY. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understood the gentleman to say that, in his judgment, the captain and officers under him in the Philippine Scouts will be able to take the examination for enlisted men in the Army.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Are they in a position where they could be construed as officers and enlisted men in the Army?

Mr. HAY. Well, they are retired now as enlisted men of the Army; and if they can be retired as enlisted men of the Army they would certainly be given the privilege by the War Department of standing an examination for enlisted men.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If they are there now, they could never comply with the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HAY. Officers in the scouts, when retired, are retired as enlisted men.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is true.

Mr. HAY. If one of these men wants to stand the examination, the War Department can give him that privilege, just as it can give him the privilege of retirement; and they would be given the preference as enlisted men over what the gentleman's amendment gives.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his legal construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That the monthly pay of enlisted men of the Army in the grades created by this act shall be as follows during their first enlistment: Band leader, quartermaster sergeant, senior grade, and master hospital sergeant, $75; hospital sergeant, $65; quartermaster sergeant, $50; regimental supply sergeant, quartermaster sergeant, and sergeant, first class, mountain battery, $45; assistant band leader and sergeant trumpeter, $40; battalion supply sergeant, squadron supply sergeant, mess sergeant and musician, first class, $36; horseshoer, mechanic of machine-gun company, musician, second class, sergeant orderly, stable sergeant, supply sergeant, and cook (Medical Corps), $30; musician, third class, $24; mechanic of Infantry or Cavalry, $21; private, first class, of Infantry, Cavalry, or Field Artillery, $15; trumpeter, orderly, and saddler, $15.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, on page 31, line 14, I move to strike out the word "trumpeter" and insert in lieu thereof the word "bugler."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 31, line 14, by striking out the word "trumpeter" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "bugler."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, on line 21, I move to strike out the word "trumpeter" and insert in lieu thereof the word "bugler."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 31, line 21, by striking out the word "trumpeter" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "bugler."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARDNER: Page 31, line 7, strike out section 15 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 15. That the monthly pay of enlisted men of the Army in the grades created by this act shall be as follows during their first enlistment: Band leader, quartermaster sergeant, senior grade, and master hospital sergeant, $80; hospital sergeant, $70; quartermaster sergeant, $55; regimental supply sergeant, quartermaster sergeant, and sergeant, first class, mountain battery, $50; assistant band leader and sergeant bugler, $45; battalion supply sergeant, squadron supply sergeant, mess sergeant and musician, first class, $40; horseshoer, mechanic of machine-gun company, musician, second class, sergeant orderly, stable sergeant, supply sergeant, and cook (Medical Corps), $33; musician, third class, $27; mechanic of Infantry or Cavalry, $25; private, first class, of Infantry, Cavalry, or Field Artillery, $20; bugler, orderly, and saddler, $20."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment raises the pay of the various noncommissioned officers and noncommissioned staff officers. The most important point to consider is that the amendment makes $20 the basic pay for the private instead of $15.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that you could get without long delay your Regular Army of 140,000 combatants of the line. It is going to be a long time before you can get any such number of men except in very hard times at $15 a month; even $15 a month and all expenses paid.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to find out how many combatants we are going to have under this act. The chairman of the committee said yesterday that the bill provides for 207,000 enlisted men, maximum, and to support that figure he presented a table prepared in The Adjutant General's Office on March 2, 1916. I have an absolutely different table, transmitted to me by the Secretary of War. According to the Secretary of War, under the proposed House bill the minimum number of enlisted men, combatants, not staff, is 95,552—less than a hundred thousand combatants, and the maximum number of combatants is 150,765. Those figures do not include the Philippine Scouts.

I tried my best to find out where the figures of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and the figures supplied by the Secretary of War differ, and here are the principal items: The gentleman from Virginia includes 11,258 men who may be employed in ammunition batteries in case of war at the discretion of the President. He includes unassigned recruits, 7,813 of them. He includes the cadet companies, 3,150 of them, and then the chairman figures the Philippine Scouts at war strength as 12,000, whereas the Secretary of War gives the Philippine Scouts, war strength, at 5,733. I think the gentleman from Virginia is right and the Secretary of War is wrong.

But when all is said and done, after studying the figures to the best of my ability, there is a discrepancy of 9,000 or 10,000 men between the two estimates of the maximum force provided in this bill.

What I especially want the committee to understand is that according to the Secretary of War, leaving out the Philippine Scouts, we shall have only 150,765 combatants in time of war under the Hay bill; and again, leaving out the Philippine Scouts, only 95,552 combatants under the minimum proposed. Do not confuse "minimum" strength with "peace" strength. Our peace strength under this law may be as high, but no higher, than 140,000 enlisted men of the line of the Army. In times of peace, under this bill, if the President wishes to recruit the Army up to 140,000 he can do so if Congress chooses to appropriate the money.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. HAY. Has the gentleman calculated how much his proposition would add to the annual expense of the Army?

Mr. GARDNER. I think it is about $10,000,000. Is that what the gentleman computes it at?

Mr. HAY. I do not know. I never heard of the amendment before.

Mr. GARDNER. That estimate is based on the numbers of the enlisted force provided in this bill. It adds $5 to the pay of each private. Now, suppose there are 140,000 enlisted men and that they are all privates. That would make an additional expense of $7,000,000. The whole bill would be considerably higher.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I listened with interest to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] as to the results of the first four days' enlistment in the attempt to secure the 19,000 men we voted for the other day, and it is evident that his proposition now to raise the pay of the Army is because gentlemen realize that we could not enlist into the Army the number of men proposed under the Kahn amendment yesterday at the present rate of pay. As I understood the gentleman's figures, he stated that in four days, under the inspiration of necessity and the need for men on the border, we have secured 500 enlistments, which would mean an average of 125 men a day.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. The exact figures are 2,426 men who applied and 555 men accepted. Perhaps there are a few of them who have not yet been examined.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The press states 507 in 5 days, but on that basis and according to the gentleman's own figures in 3 months we would raise 11,250 men, in 6 months 22,500 men, and in 12 months about 45,000 men. The report of The Adjutant General shows that last year they raised 48,813 men. With that enlistment we have not been able to maintain the combatant army at 100,000 men. To secure an army of 220,000 men, such as was contemplated in the Kahn amendment yesterday, would require the enlistment of more than double the number that were enlisted last year; that is, would require enlistments of more than 100,000 men a year, especially with the short term of enlistment now provided for in the amendment just adopted. Under the spur of necessity the figures just given us by the gentleman from Massachusetts to do so is an impossibility.

If these figures that have been submitted to us mean anything, they mean that if we had adopted the Kahn amendment yesterday, we would have put an army on the statute books and in the newspapers and not an army in the field, and that is the way the country is going to understand the whole proposition.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There is a great deal of misunderstanding, by the way, in connection with this statement so often made that the Army of the line is not enlisted up to the full 100,000 authorized by law. Of course we are not enlisted up to our full 100,000, because under Executive order the War Department is permitted to enlist only 83,893 men in the line of the Army. The fact is that Congress has only appropriated money enough for that number. As a matter of fact, we have 82,952 enlisted men in the line of the Army; so that we are less than 1,000 short of the number limited by Executive order, and that is why so many of the recruiting stations have not been in full blast.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. But the gentleman admits that even with all the inspiration of existing conditions we have not been able to get the full number.

Mr. GARDNER. As I said in debate the other day, it is absolutely impossible to think that men are going to enlist to hunt Mexican murderers, where they get $15 a month and embalming fluid.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Do you think the $15 a month is what inspires men to enlist in the Army?

Mr. GARDNER. It does not inspire men to enlist in the Army, but the other day when we wanted to pension the Spanish War Regulars on the same basis as the Spanish War Volunteers, gentlemen said it was not patriotism which made Regulars enlist. In the Spanish War widows' pension bill which went through the other day you all voted down my amendment to put the Spanish War Regulars on the same basis as the Spanish War Volunteers in the matter of widows' pensions, because gentlemen said it was not patriotism which made Regulars enlist. Gentlemen, we ought to do either one thing or the other. You must pay them or pension them—both, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HAY. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The amount is not enough to get many more men, and according to the gentleman's own statement it adds $10,000,000 a year to the expense of the Army. I do not think it is necessary to say any more.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. HAY. Surely.

Mr. GARDNER. In 1907 we raised the pay from $13.50——

Mr. HAY. In 1908.

Mr. GARDNER. In 1908 we raised the pay from $13.50——

Mr. HAY. From $13.

Mr. GARDNER. Was it not in 1907?

Mr. HAY. No; in 1908 we raised the pay of the private soldier from $13 to $15.

Mr. GARDNER. And the enlistment jumped up how many per cent?

Mr. HAY. Oh, I do not know; but the times were bad then.

Mr. GARDNER. In 1908?

Mr. GORDON. Yes; everybody was out of work.

Mr. GARDNER. Times were bad in 1907, and I was coming to that, but the gentleman from Virginia says it was in 1908.

Mr. HAY. It was in 1908 that that bill was passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That the President is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint veterinarians and assistant veterinarians in the Army, not to exceed, including veterinary officers in service, 2 such officers for each regiment of Cavalry, 1 for every 3 batteries of Field Artillery, 17 as inspectors of horses and mules and as veterinarians in the Quartermaster Corps, and 7 as inspectors of meats for the Quartermaster Corps, and said veterinarians and assistant veterinarians shall constitute the Veterinary Corps and shall be a part of the Medical Department of the Army.

That hereafter a candidate for appointment as assistant veterinarian must be a citizen of the United States, between the ages of 21 and 27 years, a graduate of a recognized veterinary college or university, and shall not be appointed until he shall have passed a satisfactory examination as to character, physical condition, general education, and professional qualifications.

That an assistant veterinarian appointed under this act shall, for the first 5 years of service as such, have the rank, pay, and allowances of second lieutenant; that after 5 years of service he shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of first lieutenant; that after 15 years of service he shall be promoted to be a veterinarian with the rank, pay, and allowances of captain: Provided, That any assistant veterinarian, in order to be promoted as hereinbefore provided, must first pass a satisfactory examination, under such rules as the President may prescribe, as to professional qualifications and adaptability for the military service; and if such assistant veterinarian shall be found deficient at such examination he shall be discharged from the Army with one year's pay.

That the veterinarians of Cavalry and Field Artillery now in the Army, together with such veterinarians of the Quartermaster Corps as are now employed in said corps, who at the date of the approval of this act shall have had less than 5 years' governmental service, may be appointed in the Veterinary Corps as assistant veterinarians with the rank, pay, and allowances of second lieutenant; those who shall have had over 5 years of such service may be appointed in said corps as assistant veterinarians with the rank, pay, and allowances of first lieutenant; and those who shall have had over 15 years of such service may be appointed in said corps as veterinarians with the rank, pay, and allowances of captain: Provided, That no such appointment of any veterinarian shall be made unless he shall first pass satisfactorily a practical professional and physical examination as to his fitness for the military service: Provided further, That veterinarians now in the Army or in the employ of the Quartermaster Corps who shall fail to pass the prescribed physical examination because of disability incident to the service sufficient to prevent them from the performance of duty valuable to the Government shall be placed upon the retired list of the Army with 75 per cent of the pay to which they would have been entitled if appointed in the Veterinary Corps as hereinbefore prescribed.

That the Secretary of War, upon recommendation of the Surgeon General of the Army, may appoint in the Veterinary Corps, for such time as their services may be required, such number of reserve veterinarians as may be necessary to attend public animals pertaining to the Quartermaster Corps. Reserve veterinarians so employed shall have the pay and allowances of second lieutenant during such employment and no longer: Provided, That such reserve veterinarians shall be graduates of a recognized veterinary college or university and shall pass a satisfactory examination as to character, physical condition, general education, and professional qualifications in like manner as hereinbefore required of assistant veterinarians; such reserve veterinarians shall constitute a list of eligibles for appointment as assistant veterinarians subject to all the conditions hereinbefore prescribed for the appointment of assistant veterinarians.

That candidates for appointment as assistant veterinarians who shall have passed satisfactorily the examinations prescribed for that grade by this act shall be appointed, in the order of merit in which they shall have passed such examination, to vacancies as they occur, such appointments to be for a probationary period of one year, after which time, if the services of the probationers shall have been satisfactory, they shall be permanently appointed with rank to date from the dates of rank of their probationary appointments. Probationary veterinarians whose services are found unsatisfactory shall be discharged at any time during the probationary period, or at the end thereof, and shall have no further claims against the Government on account of their probationary service.

That the Secretary of War shall from time to time appoint boards of examiners to conduct the veterinary examinations hereinbefore prescribed, each of said boards to consist of three medical officers and two veterinarians.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. SHERLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, and had directed him to report that the committee had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill—H. R. 12766—may be in order to-morrow, and that the House meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman let me make a suggestion before the question is stated by the Speaker? While the bill might be in order to-morrow, the gentleman has not asked to dispense with the proceedings to-morrow under the rule.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask to dispense with the business under the rule to-morrow, and that this bill may be in order, and that the House meet at 11 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the rule for to-morrow's business be dispensed with, that H. R. 12766 be in order, and that the House when it adjourns to-day adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. It there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12766.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee. I notice on page 32, line 13, it is provided that these assistant veterinarians must each be a graduate of a recognized veterinary college or university. In the State which I represent that would work no hardship, because we have veterinary colleges; but I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks the language is absolutely necessary and if it might not work a hardship in some of the smaller States where they do not have veterinary colleges but where they produce good veterinary surgeons?

Mr. HAY. I think the language ought to be there, and I do not think it will work any hardship. They have veterinary colleges in almost every State in the Union. They have one in the District of Columbia. I think they ought to have the same requirement as in the Medical Corps. The veterinarians themselves are very anxious that this standard should be higher; they want this language in the bill.

Mr. BENNET. I think the whole provision is excellent; we ought to have veterinarians, and they ought to be graduates. If the gentleman thinks that that language is necessary, I have no further comment to make, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object, because I wish to be recognized in opposition to the amendment. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the present method of appointmen of veterinaries and assistant veterinaries so far as qualifications for appointment are concerned?

Mr. HAY. Veterinarians are appointed now by the Secretary of War, and have to stand such examination as he prescribes. They have the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant.

Mr. STAFFORD. Both the veterinary and the assistant veterinary?

Mr. HAY. We do not have anything now but veterinarians; this law provides for assistants just as it provides for surgeons and assistant surgeons in the Army. They do not get the best men in the veterinary profession in the Army. There is no inducement for them to go in, no inducement for men standing high in the profession. Let me say that the House has passed the provisions of this bill twice, and the committee has reported it twice, both times unanimously, and the House took it up by unanimous consent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I will not press my inquiry further except to ask why the distinction as to allowances in the case of an assistant veterinarian who upon examination is found deficient, and you award him a year's pay, whereas for a veterinary you permit him to retire on three-fourths pay. I direct the gentleman's attention to the proviso at the bottom of page 32, which provides that if such assistant veterinarian shall be found deficient at such examination he shall be discharged from the Army with one year's pay.

Mr. HAY. That is because every veterinarian coming into the Army comes in as an assistant veterinarian.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not an assistant veterinarian an officer?

Mr. HAY. Yes; but he comes in as an assistant, and does not get up to a veterinarian until he serves a certain number of years—five, I think—and then he becomes a veterinarian. So the provision to which the gentleman has called my attention can only apply to the assistant veterinarian.

Mr. STAFFORD. The assistant veterinarian may be in the service for 15 years and longer and obtain the grade and receive the pay of a captain. I direct the gentleman's attention to the bottom of page 32. It does not provide for compulsory promotion of assistant veterinarians; they are to be promoted only when there are vacancies.

Mr. HAY. It provides that "any assistant veterinarian, in order to be promoted as hereinbefore provided, must first pass a satisfactory examination under such rules as the President may prescribe as to professional qualifications and adaptability for the military service." Then it provides that if he shall be found deficient in that examination he shall be discharged with one year's pay. That is the law applicable to the Medical Corps of the Army when the assistant surgeon stands an examination for the rank of captain. If he does not pass it satisfactorily he is discharged from the Army with one year's pay. We provide for the veterinarians just as we do for the Medical Corps.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Army surgeon, when he enters for the examination, if he is shown to be deficient he will be retired on three-quarters pay?

Mr. HAY. No; he has to pass an examination when he is promoted from captain to major, and if he fails on that examination he is discharged from the Army with one year's pay.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why do you give the veterinarian three-quarters pay when he is found to be deficient in the performance of his duties?

Mr. HAY. Where does the gentleman get that?

Mr. STAFFORD. At the bottom of page 33, and continuing on page 34. It says:

Provided further, That veterinarians now in the Army or in the employ of the Quartermaster Corps who shall fail to pass the prescribed physical examination because of disability incident to the service sufficient to prevent them from the performance of duty valuable to the Government shall be placed upon the retired list of the Army with 75 per cent of the pay to which they would have been entitled if appointed in the Veterinary Corps as hereinbefore prescribed.

Mr. HAY. Those are veterinarians that are now in the Army, and we are taking care of the veterinarians now in the Army in that provision. That does not apply to those who will come in the corps hereafter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Those who come in the corps hereafter when found deficient will be discharged with one year's pay?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. But those now in the Army when found deficient will be taken care of for life on three-quarters pay?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think there is some injustice there? Why should those future veterinarians be eliminated with one year's pay?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman will see on page 33, line 17, that it is provided:

Provided, That no such appointment of any veterinarian shall be made unless he shall first pass satisfactorily a practical professional and physical examination as to his fitness for the military service.

So that men now in the service can not get in under this law until they have passed that examination.

Mr. STAFFORD. To whom does this three-quarters pay apply?

Mr. HAY. It applies to those veterinarians now in the service who have some disability incident to the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, not by reason of any mental deficiency?

Mr. HAY. It says here in so many words, because of disability incident to the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. And not because of lack of mental efficiency, unless due directly to disability incurred in the service?

Mr. HAY. Yes; disability incurred in the service.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 33, line 24, by inserting the word "and" after the word "service."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 24, after the word "service," insert the word "and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of putting some information into the RECORD. I have in my hand a letter from the Secretary of War dated March 10, 1916, in which he says that we have 892 machine guns actually completed, and then goes on to say:

Of the 1,077 machine guns provided for, 228 are in use in the insular possessions and Panama Canal, and 276 in Continental United States for land defense of the coast fortifications, leaving 573 available for mobile troops.

He also says:

It is expected the 125 machine guns under manufacture will be completed about December 21, 1916.

Is that about the way the gentleman understands the situation?

Mr. HAY. I suppose that is the situation, and therefore I so understand it.

Mr. GARDNER. Did not Gen. Crozier testify that he had heard that each German regiment had 48 machine guns with it?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Is not our basis 5 machine guns to a regiment?

Mr. HAY. I think those are the orders of the War Department.

Mr. GARDNER. So we have only 892 guns, of which 573 are available for the mobile troops. On the German basis that would not supply a great many. It is apparently expected that 125 more will be completed by the 1st of next January.

Mr. HAY. I take it that the German troops are supplied with 48 machine guns in time of war and not in time of peace.

Mr. GARDNER. I thought that an army was supposed to get ready for war, but it seems not.

Mr. HAY. And I suppose also that we will take care of the machine-gun proposition on the Army appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That the President is authorized to organize not to exceed 30 cadet companies of Cavalry, Field Artillery, Infantry, Engineers, Coast Artillery, and Signal troops, to be attached to and serve with regiments or other units of their respective branches of the Regular Army within the continental limits of the United States.

Each company shall consist of not less than 50 and not to exceed 100 cadets, who shall be between the ages of 20 and 27 years on the date of engagement and shall be recruited from among officers of the National Guard and graduates of educational institutions to which officers of the Regular Army are detailed and from enlisted men of the Regular Army and of the National Guard. Each cadet shall be engaged for a period of six years unless sooner discharged by competent authority, the first year of which period shall be in a cadet company and the remaining five years in the officers' reserve corps provided for in this act or in the National Guard.

Each cadet shall receive during his service in a cadet company the pay and allowances of a master signal electrician and shall during such service be subject to the laws and regulations for the government of the Army of the United States.

Each cadet company shall be organized as the President shall prescribe, and all duties in the various grades and positions therein, except as otherwise herein provided for, shall be performed by cadets of the company, but no cadet shall receive any extra pay or allowances for performing such duties. For the purpose of assignment to cadet companies for the conduct of their interior administration the President is authorized to increase the number of noncommissioned officers of any organization of the Regular Army to which a fully organized cadet company of not less than 50 men is attached by one first sergeant, one mess sergeant, and one supply sergeant, and the number of cooks by two.

Each cadet company shall be subjected to thorough training, which shall include instruction in the duties of privates, noncommissioned officers, and company officers of the arm, corps, or department of the service to which the company is attached, and shall be conducted under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

Upon completion of one year's service with a company as herein prescribed each cadet shall, if found proficient, be commissioned in such grade in the officers' reserve corps as may be warranted by the degree of proficiency he may have attained, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. Any cadet who, upon the completion of one year's service, is not found proficient shall be discharged the service of the United States with such character of discharge as his services may have warranted.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 18, just read, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 18. That for the purpose of securing a sufficient reserve of officers for the military forces of the United States the President is hereby authorized to establish and maintain in civil educational institutions a reserve officers' training corps, which shall consist of a senior division organized at universities and colleges requiring four years of collegiate study for a degree, including State universities and those State institutions that are required to provide instruction in military tactics under the provisions of the act of Congress of July 2, 1862, donating lands for the establishment of colleges where the leading object shall be the practical instruction of the industrial classes in agriculture and the mechanic arts, including military tactics, and a junior division organized at all other public or private educational institutions, and each division shall consist of units of the several arms or corps in such number and of such strength as the President may prescribe.

"That the President may, upon the application of any State institution described in the first paragraph of this section, establish and maintain at such institution one or more units of the reserve officers' training corps: Provided, That no such unit shall be established or maintained at any such institution until an officer of the Army shall have been detailed as professor of military science and tactics or until such institution shall maintain under military instruction at least 100 physically fit male students.

"That the President may, upon the application of any established educational institution in the United States, other than a State institution described in the first paragraph of this section, the authorities of which agree to establish and maintain a two-years' elective or compulsory course of military training as a minimum for its physically fit male students, which course when entered upon by any student shall, as regards such student, be a prerequisite for graduation, establish and maintain at such institution one or more units of the reserve officers' training corps: Provided, That no such units shall be established or maintained at any such institution at which an officer of the Army is not detailed as professor of military science and tactics, or at any such institution which does not maintain under military instruction at least 100 physically fit male students.

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to prescribe standard courses of theoretical and practical military training for units of the reserve officers' training corps, and no unit of the senior division shall be organized or maintained at any educational institution the authorities of which fail or neglect to adopt into their curriculum the prescribed courses of military training for the senior division or to devote at least an average of three hours per week per academic year to such military training, and no unit of the junior division shall be organized or maintained at any educational institution the authorities of which fail or neglect to adopt into their curriculum the prescribed courses of military training for the junior division or to devote at least an average of three hours per week per academic year to such military training.

"That eligibility to membership in the reserve officers' training corps shall be limited to students of institutions in which units of such corps may be established who are citizens of the United States or have legally declared their intention to become such, who are not less than 14 years of age, and whose bodily condition indicates that they are physically fit to perform military duty or will be so upon arrival at military age.

"That the President is hereby authorized to detail such numbers of officers of the Army, either active or retired, not above the grade of colonel, as may be necessary, for duty as professors and assistant professors of military science and tactics at institutions where one or more units of the reserve officers' training corps are maintained, but the total number of active officers so detailed at educational institutions shall not exceed 300, and no active officer shall be so detailed who has not had five years' commissioned service in the Army. Retired officers shall not be detailed under the provisions of this section without their consent. Retired officers below the grade of lieutenant colonels so detailed shall receive the full pay and allowances of their grade, and retired officers above the grade of major so detailed shall receive the same pay and allowances as a retired major would receive under a like detail. No detail under the provisions of this section shall extend for more than four years.

"That the President is hereby authorized to detail for duty at institutions where one or more units of the reserve officers' training corps are maintained such number of enlisted men, either active or retired, as he may deem necessary, but the number of active noncommissioned officers so detailed shall not exceed 500, and all active noncommissioned officers so detailed shall be additional in their respective grades to those otherwise authorized for the Army. Retired enlisted men shall not be detailed under the provisions of this paragraph without their consent. While so detailed they shall receive active pay and allowances.

"That the Secretary of War, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to issue to institutions at which one or more units of the reserve officers' training corps are maintained such public animals, arms, uniforms, equipment, and means of transportation as he may deem necessary and to forage at the expense of the United States public animals so issued. He shall require from each institution to which property of the United States is issued a bond in the value of the property issued for the care and safe-keeping thereof and for its return when required.

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to maintain camps for the further practical instruction of the members of the reserve officers' training corps, no such camps to be maintained for a period longer than six weeks in any one year except in time of war or when war is imminent; to transport members of such corps to and from such camps at the expense of the United States so far as appropriations will permit; to subsist them at the expense of the United States while traveling to and from such camps and while remaining therein so far as appropriations will permit; to use the Regular Army, such other military forces as Congress from time to time authorizes, and such Government property as he may deem necessary for the military training of the members of such corps while in attendance at such camps; to prescribe regulations for the government of such corps, and to authorize, in his discretion, the formation of company units thereof into battalion and regimental units.

"That when any member of the senior division of the reserve officers' training corps has completed two academic years of service in that division and has been selected for further training by the president of the institution and by its professor of military science and tactics and has agreed in writing to continue in the reserve officers' training corps for the remaining two years of his course in the institution, devoting five hours per week to the military training prescribed by the Secretary of War, and has agreed in writing to pursue the courses in camp training prescribed by the Secretary of War, he may be furnished at the expense of the United States with commutation of subsistence at such rate, not exceeding the cost of the garrison ration prescribed for the Army, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War during the remainder of his service in the reserve officers' training corps.

"That the President alone, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to appoint as a reserve officer any graduate of the senior division of the reserve officers' training corps who shall have satisfactorily completed the further training provided for in the preceding paragraph hereof, or any graduate of the junior division who shall have satisfactorily completed the courses of military training prescribed for the senior division and the further training provided for in the preceding paragraph hereof, and shall have participated in such practical instruction subsequent to graduation as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, who shall have arrived at the age of 21 years, and who shall agree, under oath in writing, to serve the United States in the capacity of a reserve officer of the Army during a period of at least 10 years from the date of his appointment as such reserve officer, unless sooner discharged by proper authority, but the total number of reserve officers so appointed shall not exceed 50,000: And provided, That any graduate qualified under the provisions of this section undergoing a postgraduate course at any institution shall not be eligible for appointment as a reserve officer while undergoing such postgraduate course, but his ultimate eligibility upon completion of such postgraduate course for such appointment shall not be affected because of his having undergone such postgraduate course.

"That any physically fit male citizen of the United States between the ages of 21 and 27 years, who shall have graduated prior to the date of this act from any educational institution at which an officer of the Army was detailed as professor of military science and tactics, and who while a student at such institution completed courses of military training under the direction of such professor of military science and tactics substantially equivalent to those prescribed pursuant to this section for the senior division, shall, after satisfactorily completing such additional practical military training as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, be eligible for appointment as a reserve officer and as a temporary additional second lieutenant in accordance with the terms of this section.

"That the President alone is hereby authorized to appoint and commission as a temporary second lieutenant of the Regular Army for a period of at least six months, with the allowances now provided by law for that grade, but with pay at the rate of $100 per month, any reserve officer appointed pursuant to this section and to attach him to a unit of the Regular Army for duty and training during the period covered by his appointment as such temporary second lieutenant, and upon the expiration of such service with the Regular Army such officer shall revert to his status as a reserve officer.

"That no reserve officer or temporary second lieutenant appointed pursuant to this section shall be entitled to retirement or to retired pay, and shall be eligible for pension only for disability incurred in line of duty in active service or while serving with the Regular Army pursuant to the provisions of this section.

"That in time of war the President may order reserve officers appointed under the provisions of this section to active duty with any of the military forces of the United States in any grades not below that of second lieutenant, and while on active duty they shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I move as a substitute for the amendment just offered the substitute which I now send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAGE of North Carolina). I understand the gentleman offers it as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. As an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. Does the gentleman offer it as a substitute or an amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer it as a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. GARD. There is no amendment offered; a substitute is offered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer it as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio was offered as a substitute.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will offer it as an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment as an amendment to the substitute. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk began the reading of the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a question of order; as I understand from the reading of the amendment it is offered as an entire new proposition for the proposition under consideration, not as an amendment but virtually as a substitute for the substitute, and therefore it can not be entertained at this time. The only way this proposition can be entertained is to vote down the substitute and consider this.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will allow, in the opinion of the Chair this is not an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio, but is a substitute for section 18.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out everything in the amendment just offered after the word "that" and insert that amendment in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will allow, if he desires consideration of the substitute he offered, if he will only bide his time, I think under the rules he can have it submitted. He could get action on his substitute in the event the present substitute is voted down, but in the event it was adopted——

Mr. McKELLAR. That is just it. Mr. Chairman, I submit it is proper to offer it as an amendment to the substitute striking out everything after the word "that" in the substitute that is offered and insert the amendment I have offered. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to page 349, section 804, rule 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, in the opinion of the Chair, hinges upon the germaneness of the language. It is germane to the subject matter and therefore the gentleman's motion is in order and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is to strike out all of the amendment offered as a substitute by the gentleman from Ohio and substitute his amendment in its place. Is that right?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which is germane and is in order. The Chair entertains the gentleman's motion, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That in order more effectually to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining troops for service in time of war and more quickly to raise and support an army in the event of war, and for the purpose of maintaining an efficient Army Officers' Reserve Corps, there is hereby designated or established in each State of the Union an educational and military training institution to be known as the military training college of such State. Said college after the second year of its opening shall have not less than an average number of 300 students, whose educational training shall at all times be under the direction and control of the board of trustees or faculty of such institution as hereinafter provided, and whose military training shall at all times be under the direction and control of the officer or officers to be designated for such duty by the President of the United States from the officers of the Regular Army and under the general control of the board of three hereinafter established. The limitation of the number of officers which may be detailed to military schools under section 1225 of the Revised Statutes is hereby abrogated, and the detail of officers for this purpose is left to the discretion of the President.

That after the passage of this act each State, by resolution or other enactment by its legislature, shall designate such college or other educational institution already established, or such institution as may be established, to receive the benefits of this act, and after the passage of such resolution or other enactment the same shall be duly certified to the Secretary of War by the executive officers of such institution.

That each State shall, by resolution or other enactment of its legislature, or, in the event of the failure or refusal of the legislature to act within a reasonable time from the passage of this act, then any institution may make the guarantee, if approved by the board of three hereinafter named, to the United States that there will not, at any time during the college year after the first year, be less than an average of 300 students at such institution who shall receive military training each year; that such institution has and will continue to have an annual net income of not less than $40,000 appropriated to it by such State, or by the institution itself, for the use of such military department; that out of this sum and the sum hereinafter appropriated in this act and allotted by the board hereinafter established such institution, free of charge to such students, will properly house, feed, and maintain said 300 students during their said terms, such students to be selected as hereinafter provided; that it will cause suitable dormitories and classrooms to be set apart or built for the use of military students; that it will cause a suitable campus or drill ground to be prepared and maintained for the use of said student corps; that it will furnish a full quota of efficient and trained teachers to give said students a thorough academic education, consisting of not less than three nor more than four years' course, fashioned as near as may be after the course of study now prescribed at the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y.: Provided, That the board hereinafter mentioned shall have the power to prescribe in said institutions, or such of them as it may designate, vocational training in addition to or in lieu of a portion of the training had at said United States Military Academy. The United States shall furnish, and the War Department is hereby authorized to issue, such arms, ammunition, equipment, stores, service uniforms, and the like as may be necessary for the use of such students and which may be furnished without injury to the military service.

That should some established institution of learning not already exclusively a military school be designated as beneficiary under this act, then the military feature must be separate from the remainder of such institution, in so far as the training, discipline, and course of study of such institution are concerned; but the same instructors, teachers, classrooms, grounds, and the like now used for other departments in such institution may be used in said military department upon approval of the board hereinafter established.

That the students herein provided for shall be boys, who at the date of their entrance shall not be under 16 or over 21 years of age; that they shall be selected by competitive examination and, as far as may be practicable, from each county in the State, at least one student from each county, by the county superintendent of public instruction or other officer fulfilling like duties in each county, where there is such officer, and where there is no such officer, then by the chief educational officer of the State, the remainder of such students to be selected as hereinafter provided: Provided, however, That the board hereinafter named is hereby empowered to make rules and regulations governing admission to said colleges in furtherance of the purposes of this act, which rules and regulations must be complied with by county superintendents or other educational officers designated herein. No boy will be entitled to admission to said academies unless he is of good moral character, sound of body, fit to be a soldier, of good mind and health, and is able to pass a reasonable examination to be made by said superintendents or other educational officers designated herein touching the following subjects: Reading, writing, English grammar, United States history, general geography, arithmetic, and the first principles of algebra. It is the intention of this act that the course of study at said institutions shall be such as that given at first-class colleges where degrees of bachelor of arts, bachelor of science, and such similar degrees are awarded upon graduation, and said institutions are hereby empowered to grant such degrees to graduating students. No boy shall be entitled to admission in such institution unless he is willing to agree, and does agree, in writing, that he will serve in said academy during the whole course unless sooner graduated, as hereinafter provided, and that after his graduation he will serve the United States at any time he may be called upon by the Secretary of War within a period of seven years after his graduation; that during the seven years after his graduation he will keep the War Department notified of his residence and his change of residence, if any, and during said period he will respond to any call made on him to enter the military service of the United States as an Army officer for any period for which his services may be needed not to exceed the seven years' period: And provided further, That he may be required to serve in times of peace in summer camps for a period not exceeding four weeks in any one year during said period: Provided, however, That no student coming under the provisions of this act shall be required to serve more than three such camp periods.

That the annual sum of $3,840,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary—$80,000 to each State—is hereby annually appropriated, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the said purpose of aiding in the education, military training, disciplining, housing, feeding, and clothing said boys in the various institutions herein provided for, said several sums to be paid to the board of trustees, or to the governing authorities of such institution, or such officer or officers as said trustees may designate in each institution, monthly upon the certificate of the board created by this act that the terms of this act have been complied with by such institution. No money appropriated under the provisions of this act shall be paid out to any beneficiary under it except upon the certificate of said board, or a majority thereof, that such institution has complied with the rules and regulations established by said board and the terms of this act.

That the course of training, the discipline, the organization of students into corps, and the rules governing the training, mental and physical, are all to be fashioned as closely after the course of instruction and discipline in vogue at the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., as may be possible: Provided, That the board hereinafter mentioned shall have the power to prescribe in said institutions, or such of them as it may designate, vocational training in addition to or in lieu of a portion of the training had at said United States Military Academy: Provided further, That the War Department, the board hereinafter established, the commandant or other officer or officers detailed for duty hereunder, the faculty, and the executive officers of each institution acting in concert, all are required to carry out the purposes of this act, which are the higher and more complete education of boys coming within its provisions and their efficient military training, to equip them to defend their country in case of necessity.

That for the purpose of carrying this enactment into effect a board consisting of the Secretary of War, an officer of the Army to be designated by the President, and a civilian of high character and attainments, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is hereby established. The duties of this board shall be to cooperate with the State authorities and with the board of trustees or governing authorities of the various institutions herein provided for to carry out the terms, provisions, and purposes of this act. Said board shall have power to make and enforce all needful rules and regulations governing the admission of students to said institution, the military discipline, number of hours given to military instruction and drills, the guarding of the barracks, the conduct of the students, their punishment or dismissal for infractions of rules, the granting of furloughs and vacations, the designation of uniforms, the calls to summer-camp service, calls to war service, recommendation of graduates suitable for reserve officers, the register of their names as required by acts of Congress, together with all such needful rules and regulations pertaining to the military features of such institution and calls to service during the contract period. The said board shall have the power to formulate rules and regulations under which such students may be selected from preparatory and other schools and colleges and from the State at large in those cases where each county does not furnish its quota of students as hereinbefore provided in this act, and if said students can not be obtained in this way in said institutions, then the said board is authorized to formulate rules and regulations by which students may be selected from the Nation at large, to the end that there may be a minimum of 300 students at all times in said institutions. The board shall further have the power to provide rules and regulations for the admission of students generally and from preparatory and other schools and colleges in all cases not hereinbefore provided for. All allotments of money to institutions shall be made by said board on the basis, as far as may be practicable, that the boys can be kept, maintained, and educated, including board in said institution, at $400 each per year. The Secretary of War and an officer of the Army designated by the President shall receive no compensation for their services on said board other than they now receive by law. The Secretary of War shall be president of said board. The civilian appointee provided for herein shall be secretary of the board and shall hold his office for a term of six years, and shall devote his entire time and attention to the work of the board herein provided for, and shall receive a yearly salary of $6,000, payable monthly, and such sum is hereby annually appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

That the board herein provide for and the faculty of each of such institutions are hereby empowered to make all needful rules in reference to dividing the students herein provided for into classes the first year with the object and purpose of graduating as near as may be practicable 100 students from each of said institutions each year from the beginning.

That upon their graduation from the several institutions set out in this bill such graduates shall be at once transferred to the Army Officers' Reserve Corps, as provided by law, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, there will probably be some discussion of this, and I would like to know how much time the gentleman wants, so I can arrange for it. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio want?

Mr. GARD. A number of gentlemen have spoken to me on the subject, and if those gentlemen desire to speak I wish they would indicate.

Mr. KAHN. I have applications for 35 minutes over here.

Mr. HAY. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio want?

Mr. GARD. Personally?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. HAY. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee desire?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will take the same.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section, the substitute, and all amendments thereto, be closed in one hour, to be divided—the Chair can parcel out the time.

Mr. KAHN. The gentlemen over here who have asked for time ought to be recognized, because I understand the gentleman is making division upon that basis.

Mr. HAY. I do not know how the gentlemen are; I do not know which one of these propositions they are for.

Mr. KAHN. They have simply asked for the right to discuss the proposition.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will it not resolve itself into a contest between the Gard bill and the McKellar bill? That is just what it will come down to in the end, a contest between those two bills. Now, any fair division of the time that will take care of that arrangement ought to be made.

Mr. HAY. How much time does the gentleman desire in favor of the Gard proposition?

Mr. KAHN. Twenty-seven minutes on the Gard proposition——

Mr. GARD. Forty-five minutes, I would suggest.

Mr. HAY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section, on the substitute, and all amendments thereto be closed at 4 o'clock, one-half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee and the other by the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on section 18 of the bill, the substitute, and all amendments thereto be closed at 4 o'clock——

Mr. HAY. And all amendments to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. And all amendments to the substitute; half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] and the other half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the substitute as offered by me for section 18 of the pending bill is not one which deals in so-called mechanical preparedness, but is one which has very much to do, I am sure, with that preparedness—physical, mental, and moral—which is necessary to maintain us in our exalted rank as the very first nation in all the world. I am thoroughly appreciative of the great work of the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, and would not offer this substitute unless I had done as I have, when, on March 17, last Friday, I caused to be published in the RECORD the text of that which I would offer as a substitute for section 18. The House knows, and those who have had dealings with the Committee on Military Affairs know, but I feel that not alone should the House know and those who have had dealings with the Committee on Military Affairs know, but the whole country should know of the accurate and comprehensive knowledge possessed by and the patriotic application thereof by the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HAY. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in the serious business of writing this bill we approach a very important paragraph. At least, it is made very important by the substitute first proposed. The substitute which I have offered, I can say very frankly to you, is brought to you unassociated with any hysteria of apprehension, and not with the closing of the eyes to existing possibilities of danger, but it is a proposition which has been very carefully matured, which has been thought over and given careful consideration by men who have the very best interests of the country at heart, and who are most competent to give expression to the very best methods of training in student life.

And therefore I propose during the greater part of what I have to say to acquaint you briefly with that which this bill seeks to incorporate in the pending Military Affairs bill in this House.

At the present time and for 50 years, under the so-called Morrill Act, the Government of the United States has been giving aid to agricultural and mechanical colleges throughout this country, with the idea of increasing the mental and physical supremacy of American young men. This proposed substitute can be comprehended in one statement, when I say to you that this is an extension of the so-called Morrill Act to cover existing conditions and existing needs. The proposition that we now have, as made by this substitute, is that in the so-called land-grant colleges and, indeed, in all such other colleges as may come within the purview of the educational qualifications of this act, there is to be instituted and carried on in educational institutions two divisions for military instruction—a junior and a senior division. I pause long enough to say that I am in entire accord with the proposition that the United States of America is not to be in time of peace converted into an armed camp. I am not of those who believe in a large standing army, but I am of those who believe in the training of the young men of our country. [Applause.] And therefore this bill has for its basis, has for its best continuation, the training of the young men of this country.

I read from a publication in a Washington newspaper very recently, with my approval, the following language:

> The experience of every other nation teaches that the proper time to give military training is when young men are just out of school or college. Better still, if military discipline could be worked into the general course at the large educational institutions, it would not be long before a large part of the population would be well trained and ready to join the Army in case of war.

If we start with that proposition, we start with it as an educational proposition. Two divisions are herein made, namely, a so-called junior division and a senior division, and without going particularly into the details of these divisions, I merely desire to say that before anyone can be assigned to active duty as a reserve officer the young man must have had a four years' military training under a course prescribed by the Secretary of War and under the immediate instruction of a competent Army officer. It carries a provision that before one can be appointed to the officer's reserve corps he must be of those selected by the president of the institution in which he is a student and have the recommendation of physical and mental fitness by the officer who has been assigned to afford military instruction at his institution. There is no increased expense beyond the expense of a probable addition in numbers to the boys already receiving military instruction in these educational institutions, and for the enlarged course of military instruction. It provides for no military burden, causes no erection of barracks, no change of course of study, but it provides for a mental and physical training in military affairs of the young men in these colleges, of three hours a week for the first two years and of five hours a week for the second two years. In addition to that, before there can be any assignment by the President, it provides that these selected students shall then have had a course of attachment to the Regular Army of six months, where they are to learn the actual and practical application of military affairs and of that which they have learned in the college or school. After this time, after graduation, these selected students enter into a written agreement to the effect that if there is a call in time of war they will respond. This agreement governs their conduct for the term of 10 years. There is no expense, there is no pay to these students except during the time when they are actually in the service of the United States.

In the event of a call to arms, of course they would receive the same salary as is paid to a second lieutenant of infantry at this time; but there is no expense, except the slight additional expense of affording them opportunity for instruction during the last two years of their course in these colleges. But no expense of assignment, no general military expense, is associated with this bill, and none can be until these young men are actually brought out on call to be second lieutenants of the Volunteer forces. The bill does not change the way in which officers may be selected. It merely supplements and increases the way in which officers may be selected, and the gist of the whole bill is that this substitute proposal picks out the very flower of the young men of our country, for we all know that the very flower of our young men are those who seek to educate themselves, who through their own abilities and own industries and efforts are seeking to educate themselves.

These boys, to a large degree, go into the educational institutions mentioned in this substitute and earnestly strive, with the addition of the course of study therein prescribed, to perfect themselves for the duties of civil life.

Now, this bill cleaves to that line. It is not exclusively a military bill, if by such language it might be said that it seeks to build up a spirit of militarism in the country or in our youth, but it is a bill of preparation; it is a bill of physical and of mental and of moral preparation, the preparation of patriotism. It is such a bill that allows these boys and young men to carry on their course of study, influenced only by what they are to be in after life in the civic side. It affords them every educational opportunity to be good American citizens, and that is the very highest thing. It has to do and it deals with a body of young men, gentlemen of this committee, who through their school course and in their after years live the lives of good American citizens and carry out the ideals of American citizenship. You may be assured that if this body of splendid young men, the flower of the country, is actually called for service in time of war they will respond unafraid and without hesitation, even to the most supreme sacrifice.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, unfortunately I have not been here within the last few days, and my remarks on this bill will therefore be in a measure desultory. There are two plans. One is the plan offered by my friend from Ohio, Mr. GARD, which is known as the colleges' plan. It is the plan that has been agreed upon by the colleges and universities of our country, and is a mild continuation of the plan adopted in the Morrill Act.

Now, you gentlemen who are familiar with military education in this country know that the reason of the Morrill Act was to supplement in some respects West Point. It was enacted during the Civil War. It has never accomplished anything in the way of an effective plan of preparedness. Why? Because it has no coordinated plan. The Government has no control over the graduates. The United States Government, that furnishes the money to these institutions, has no way of getting service in return for the money, and while those colleges, by the expenditure of that money, may have been benefited—I have no doubt they have been—yet, so far as the millitry preparation of the country is concerned, the Government of the United States has got but small return for the outlay of money.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. In a moment I will. So it is with this college plan. Why, gentlemen of the House, the greatest need in time of trouble, as every sensible man knows, is Army officers. You can make a soldier or enlisted man in a reasonably short time, but you can not make an officer overnight. You have to train him. You have to train him in his youth, and if you want to make an effective force of Army officers, or a reserve force of Army officers, you must do it with a coordinated plan, where the Government holds the strings and holds, to some extent, at least, the control over the military education of the boys.

Now, let us take up the two plans just for a moment. Here we need, according to the report of our War College, some 25,000 or 30,000 reserve Army officers. Some of their estimates go even higher than that.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the gentleman will just wait for a few minutes, until I have indicated the two plans, I will yield to him. It is essential, Mr. Chairman, that we should have a thoroughly coordinated plan of education under the control of the Government, which furnishes the money to help them, if we want to have success in securing a well-trained force of officers in time of trouble. You have heard the plan submitted here by my friend from Ohio, Mr. GARD. It means nothing. It is far less than the present plan under the Morrill Act, and you know that has meant nothing to us from a military standpoint, comparatively speaking.

Now, what is the plan suggested in my bill? I want to say that my bill was not conceived since this war began. My bill was prepared by me and introduced into this House nearly two years before the European war began. It was recommended at one time by the War Department. Last year it was favorably reported to this House. It is now on the calendar with another favorable report. And what is that plan? Under my plan we have a board of three, appointed by the President, to have control of these State and National institutions.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right at that point?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the gentleman will wait until I have stated it I will. I will be delighted to yield. Our country, when we had less than 5,000,000 people, had one West Point, and we now have 100,000,000 people and we have no other supplementary institution to that. The general plan of my bill is to establish in each State in the Union one of these institutions fashioned in part after West Point, providing for a course of vocational education, so that, if you please, if you want to teach young men how to make powder, how to make arms, how to make munitions of war, we can do it in these several institutions that are established throughout the country.

Now, on what plan? That the Government is to furnish two-thirds of the expense and the States are to furnish one-third of the expense. How are these boys to be selected? Each State and any established institution in a State may receive the benefits of the act by agreeing to put up that one-third. Established institutions as a rule will get the money. But what has the State got to do with it? It has to give a four-year course of military training fashioned after West Point to at least 300 boys a year. These boys are to be selected by county superintendents of education from each county in each State. In that way military training will be established throughout the confines of our land. No State-rights principle is involved, because the State has a part in the plan. It provides for no militarism, but for education and military discipline as well.

Now, how do we know we are going to get a trained force under the system that I propose?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. In a moment. Is it left to conjecture? Not at all. By section 9 of the proposed act it is provided that a commission or committee shall be established, composed of the Secretary of War and an Army officer selected by the President, and one civilian, and they are to hold the purse strings; they are to say what nature the military discipline shall be, and unless these institutions furnish the quid pro quo they do not get the money. And that is the best way on earth to insure that the Government will get what it seeks in the way of an effective Army reserve.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McKELLAR. In one moment. No; I will yield right here.

Mr. MADDEN. How many States have colleges of the kind that the gentleman proposes now?

Mr. McKELLAR. Nearly every State in the Union.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the Government of the United States be called upon to build colleges under this bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. And I want to show you the essential difference between my bill and the bill proposed by my friend, Mr. GARD. My bill proposes to educate free of charge 15,000 worthy young men in the country each and every year. His bill provides that whatever is contributed by the Government goes to the colleges and universities of the country. The question is whether you are going to stand for the free education of the worthy young men of our country, or whether you want to pour more funds into the hands of the colleges and universities that are already established.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman state to the committee how many colleges there are that will be qualified to give the character of education proposed in this bill, and what States they are in, and how much it will cost the Government of the United States each year? And another question that I want to ask before I sit down is, Would it not be likely that if this bill were made a part of the military establishment the States would find themselves just as they do in the case of river and harbor work, in a pork-barrel scheme, to get appropriations?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all, because it is an entirely different proposition. You can not do it. The bill establishes a Federal commission, which has to pass on the military training secured, and the money is not paid to any State until the work is done. You have no such provision as that in the river and harbor bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied 10 minutes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Chairman notify me at the end of five minutes more, please? I want to answer some questions that gentlemen have asked me.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understood the gentleman to say that he did not think the money now appropriated under the existing Morrill Act resulted in any miltary efficiency for the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. You can not get any Army officer to say it does, or to say any more than this, that it furnishes a general military education, in a way, to a lot of boys; but the War Department has no control over them; that is what I mean. There is no coordination about it. There is no way under the Morrill Act to make the military training given in these institutions an available military asset.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think that is exactly and literally correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. If you know of any control that the Morrill Act gives over them, it is more than I can find or more than the War Department has been able to find.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I received military training in one of these schools. That school to-day has a regiment of 1,200 men, and if you will read the report of the Army officers who inspected that school last year you will see that there is not a finer military organization in the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. That may be true of your school.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And the State of Illinois has 2,400 men in its regiment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it the gentleman's idea that the agricultural and mechanical colleges which have had Government aid have not turned out good officers for the Army?

Mr. McKELLAR. Very few, in comparison with what we pay for them. They cost us somewhere in the neighborhood of $6,000,000, and you have not any power over them to make them act as reserve officers. You do not know what kind of training they receive. They receive, for instance, in the school to which the gentleman from Minnesota refers—I do not know which one that is——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The University of Minnesota.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the University of Minnesota they receive a lot of the best kind of military training. In other institutions of the country they receive just enough to get the Federal appropriation, and that is all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I wish to say to the gentleman that I know some very brilliant officers who have gone into the Army from agricultural and mechanical schools.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and there are some very brilliant officers in the Army who never went to any military school until after they got into the Army, but that is no criterion. What we need to do by this bill is to build up a coordinated plan of military training for officers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman's amendment provide that the teachers shall be furnished by the institution, and in that way does he not lose the national connection?

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, not at all. The military training, under my bill, is given over to an Army officer selected by the Secretary of War, who has control over the military training of the boys at that institution. Now, gentlemen, as it seems to me, it is just a question whether you want to vote for the boys. Think of it—a free education to 15,000 boys every year. It is a question whether you want to vote for that or whether you want to vote in favor of established institutions that will not give the boys any free education.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman's bill provide that the institution shall furnish a full quota of thoroughly trained teachers?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course it does. That is what is provided in the Gard bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman break away from the idea of the union between the Nation and the States?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all, as the gentleman will see if he will examine the whole bill instead of one section. He will find that it presents a very carefully developed plan.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. My understanding is that some such provision exists in Canada for Dominion aid to the colleges.

Mr. McKELLAR. A very similar provision; and, by the way, Canada has furnished a great many of the officers to the English Army.

Mr. REILLY. What is this bill going to cost?

Mr. McKELLAR. A little less than $4,000,000. And, by the way, let me say right here that the 30 cadet companies provided in the original section will cost nearly $6,000,000 a year. I do not know how much the Gard bill will cost, and nobody can tell. It provides for furnishing horses for cavalry, and various other things, to these institutions that want to be built up at the expense of the Government. I do not blame the institutions and colleges, but the question is whether you are going to vote here to contribute money to the colleges and universities of the country without getting any return for it, or whether you are going to vote for a coordinated plan to give military training, which will be a real training, under the control of the War Department, under the control of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will take one minute more to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to have the gentleman explain one of the very best features of his bill, and I say that because I have devoted some study to it myself.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield the gentleman five minutes to discuss it.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to have the gentleman tell the committee what return the Government gets from these young men.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very glad indeed that the gentleman has called my attention to that. Of course this is not to be given to the boys without some return. They are required to contract in writing that in return for this free education—and it will graduate somewhere in the neighborhood of 5,000 a year when all the institutions are running—they will serve their Government at any time called upon within seven years after graduation as Army officers. They are required to sign an agreement in writing to that effect. In that way, in the course of seven years, we will have an ever-continuing reserve of some 30,000 officers for less than $4,000,000 a year. By educating these boys we will have a continuing reserve of somewhere in the neighborhood of 30,000 Army officers, the number required by the War Department under the present plan.

Mr. GARD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE].

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I trust this House will not pass the McKellar bill without giving it more consideration. This proposition has not been well considered. You are about to tie the hands of your State universities and agricultural colleges in every State without proper investigation, and the man who comes upon the floor of this House and cripples his State institutions, agricultural college and college of mechanical arts, makes a serious mistake, and he will find it out when he hears from his constituents interested in maintaining agricultural schools. You may deprive your agricultural school and university of your State of the Morrill fund, not realizing the full force of this bill, which has not been properly considered. I say to you, if you take the Morrill fund from the University of Georgia, the agricultural school of my State will suffer, and I beg you to think before you act unwisely on this bill. I hold a letter in my hand from Chancellor Borrow, of the University of Georgia. He is a wise and great man; he does not speak idle words; he does not talk much, but when he investigates a question and gives his opinion it means something. Chancellor Borrow protests against the passage of this bill, and one paragraph in his letter reads as follows:

> Any direct appropriation for higher education in Georgia has a constitutional limitation which places the institution to which the appropriation is made under the control of the trustees of the university. It seems to me that the bill of Mr. McKELLAR, which places the supreme control in a board of three, would require an amendment to our State constitution before its provisions could be met by the State.

That is a serious proposition for the University of Georgia and the agricultural department, where there are 400 or 500 students every year carefully drilled, trained, and prepared to take charge of any command in the United States. To require the University of Georgia or your State to get a constitutional amendment in order to retain the Morrill fund is absurd. Furthermore, the changes proposed by the McKellar bill would cause confusion in all the States using the land-scrip fund.

Mr. Chairman, such a bill as this should be on an appropriation bill to be considered in a few minutes, as an amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the first place, I want to say that this is not an appropriation bill, and, in the second place, there is no reason on earth why the University of Georgia can not accept the benefits of this bill if it wants to.

Mr. TRIBBLE. This bill provides for an expenditure of over $100,000,000. The gentleman comes from Tennessee and does not know anything about the condition of the University of Georgia. I have quoted from Chancellor Borrow of the university, and he knows the situation. The gentleman from Tennessee does not know anything about the constitution of Georgia or the constitution of other States in this Union. I grant he knows what is in the constitution of Tennessee. I do not doubt that. But I insist that the university of my State should not suffer on account of premature action on this bill. Let us not pass any kind of legislation relating to war measures without proper deliberation just because preparedness is popular. We should act with proper care and give the country what is needed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there is not a superior body of men and soldiers on the face of this earth to that body of boys at the University of Georgia. They are thoroughly trained and are able to take charge of any command of soldiers in the United States. They enter the freshman class and take military training four years. You would be surprised to know the great number of brave, trained young men who wanted to go to the front with Capt. J. H. Busse's volunteer company at Athens in the Spanish-American War, but were rejected because this brave young volunteer officer could not accept more volunteers.

Mr. Chairman, I trust this House will not interfere with the great work done by the institutions using the Morill funds, and I appeal to you to defeat this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

[Mr. HOWARD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope I am not biased by the fact that I attended one of the land-grant colleges. I spent five years in what is now called the University of Illinois, then the Illinois Industrial University. During that time I took military training and military instruction—a course of three years in military instruction. I was captain of Company F for one year, captain of Company A for one year, and, I think, though I may be mistaken about it, that when I came out of the university, I was quite competent to instruct a company of raw recruits and to command a company with reasonable success under superior and wiser officers.

I do not think the University of Illinois gives quite as much attention to military matters now as it did in those days, which were not so long after the Civil War, but there is no reason why they should not give the same attention now if the Government encourages or requires it, and that university, having thousands of students at it, bright young men, if they are given military training under the instruction of Army officers, will furnish lots of good soldiers and good officers, and, in my opinion, it can be done faster in that way than in any other way. The Gard bill would do that. The McKellar bill would provide for certain students who were charity students. I remember when I came out of the University of Illinois, then called the Illinois Industrial University, that the word "industrial" afterward became attached to certain penal and reformatory institutions to such an extent that many of the old students, though they had not been these charity students, felt the ignominy of being compared with reformatory institutions and secured the change of the name. I do not believe it is feasible to say that in each State of the Union you shall have 300 students on the charity of the Government, when you can get thousands of students on the other side who earn, many of them, their own way through college, with a determination to have an education, and who are as patriotic as any students ever can be. I remember our regiment in the seventies, when trouble was threatened with Spain, had a meeting and wired to the President of the United States, tendering their services as enlisted men, and even so long after my own education at the University when the Spanish War broke out, while I was a Member of Congress, remembering that I had taken military instruction and drill through the expense of the United States, and its grant to the land-grant colleges, I offered to enlist out of this House into the Army as a private from Illinois. [Applause.] I do not think that I was at all exceptional in this regard. I think if you will make these land-grant colleges feel that they owe something to the Government, and make the students who go there feel that they have received some training through the benefit and aid of the Government and the Army officers, you can build up as fine a lot of young men as you will ever find in the world for the amount of instruction which is given to them. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I think there may have been a misconception of the Gard bill through what was said by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] when he stated that the Gard bill was the college bill. I fear some might think it would be limited to the land-grant colleges. That is not true. There are now 101 colleges in the United States to each of which is attached an Army officer or some one of rank detailed by the Army as an instructor of military tactics, and of that group there are only 51 that are land-grant colleges. The balance of them are either individually owned as private institutions or have some other designation. A statement by Supt. Jones before the committee showed 11 essentially military colleges, 27 essentially military schools, 53 land-grant colleges and other colleges, and 9 other institutions in which military training is now given. The wording of the bill says:

> Shall consist of a senior division organized at universities and colleges requiring four years of college study.

That is one designation. It refers to those schools which require four years as a requisite for an academic degree, and it—> includes those State institutions that are required to provide instruction in military tactics as one of the conditions of original grant.

That phrase refers to the land-grant colleges. Then there is the second class:

> There shall be also a junior division organized at all other public or private educational institutions. This provision will extend to those schools which do not require four years for graduation.

So that it is a misconception to think that the Gard bill is limited to the land-grant colleges.

As I said a moment ago, there are at present 101 that give this instruction, and under this bill that number can be increased without limit, for the reason that any institution that maintains 100 students of healthy body will fall within the requirements of the Gard bill. If a million men were called for some time in the future we probably could easily get them, but we would not have the officers to command them; and it seems to me that one of the great requirements is for us to provide for these officers as speedily and as economically as we can. Volunteers we can get at any time, but officers to command them is the problem. Here is an opportunity under the utilization of the present existing educational institutions by which we can supply a very large number of officers who might be required. President James of the State University of Illinois said before the committee that his institution had 2,069 in the military department last year. I do not know how many it has this year, but it was stated there were over 2,000—2,400 this year. It was stated before the committee that the University of California has something like 2,500. I know that the State University of Ohio has a very large attendance of these military students. In Ohio there are four institutions to which are detailed Army officers; in Georgia I think there are four; in Illinois there are at least two; and in Indiana there are four, I think.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to say that the Pennsylvania State College has 1,200 students trained in the science of military tactics, with one Army officer detailed?

Mr. FESS. I am aware of that, and the truth about the matter is there is not more than one Army officer to any of these institutions. This bill seeks to cure this defect in this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent——

The CHAIRMAN. The time is controlled by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARD. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. FESS. Five minutes.

Mr. GARD. I am very much impoverished for time because I said I would take care of a number of gentlemen who asked for time. Possibly the gentleman from Tennessee will give some of his time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I desire time enough to say that as a student in one of the institutions in Ohio I had the opportunity of a military training for four years. In that institution I was a professor for 15 years. During all of that time I saw the work of the military department of that institution and can testify to the splendid work of that particular college activity. When the war broke out with Spain there was a call made upon that institution and Capt. H. L. Price, now of the Regular Army, doing service down on the Mexican border, was one of the boys who had been drilled in that private institution, who had come there without money and worked his way through as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and he now holds an unusually distinguished place in the Regular Army. In Cuba he was present and on Gen. Shafter's staff when Santiago was surrendered. I wanted the three minutes to say that the training of these schools is not in competition with West Point or the established military institutions under the Government. It is simply to supplement the work of those institutions, and it seems to me that it is the most economical method by which we can supply what might be a great demand in the future. Why not utilize these institutions as they are now without very much added expenditures? Think of the value, not to the Nation alone but to the individual student. No student has ever been harmed by military training. It is one of the finest mental disciplines of which I know. No boy can stand in company form and execute the manual of arms and be indifferent. He has to be on the qui vive every minute and is thereby wonderfully disciplined in mental training. Besides that the moral influence is wonderfully valuable. To be under discipline and to learn obedience is one of the moral lessons our youths most need to-day. Aside from this influence, military training has a very important influence on the health of the body. These are items of importance to the student, to say nothing of its value to the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I append here a statement from Capt. Converse, commandant of cadets at the Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RALPH D. MERSHON,
80 Maiden Lane, New York.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the questionnaire submitted to me by you relative to the subject of military training in civil educational institutions and the bearing thereon of the Pomerene bill, S. 3946. In what follows I have repeated the questionnaire and under each question given the answer thereto.

(1) What legislation is there now in force providing for military education in civil educational institutions?

The Morrill Act of 1862 and subsequent amendments and extensions.

This act gave a grant of land to establish at least one college in each State where "the leading object shall be, without excluding other scientific and classical studies, and including military tactics, to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts, in such manner as the legislatures of the States may respectively prescribe," etc.

To carry out the military part of this program supplemental legislation has been passed authorizing the detail of Army and Navy officers as instructors in institutions having the capacity to educate at one and the same time not less than 150 male students and authorizing the issuance of military equipment to colleges and universities.

The War Department has issued general orders for the execution of this work.

These acts have been amended from time to time increasing the number of officers available for teaching duty.

Under this legislation a great system of colleges and universities has been created, slowly at first, but with gathering momentum as the years have passed, in which military instruction is an important feature.

It is to be noted that the above-mentioned supplemental legislation, authorizing the detail of Army and Navy officers and the issuance of military equipment applies to any college or university meeting the prescribed requirements, but that it gives preference to the land-grant colleges.

(2) What is the total number of "land-grant colleges" established under the Morrill Act, and what is the total number of men under arms at these institutions?

At the present time there are 50 land-grant colleges, including 1 in Hawaii and 1 in Porto Rico. One of the land-grant calleges in the United States has no officer detailed to it. The total number of students under military instruction at these institutions in 1915 was 22,938. This figure is from reports made by the colleges to the War Department at the end of the school year and represents the minimum of attendance during the year. The average of attendance for the school year would approach 25,000.

(3) What is the total number of civil educational institutions of all kinds in which military training is now given, and of this number (A) how many require four years of collegiate work for a degree, and (B) how many require less than four years of collegiate work for graduation?

The following figures apply to the year 1915:

Class (A): Land grant	49
Others	14
		63
Class (B)		38
Total		101

(4) How many men are there under arms in each of the two classes of institutions mentioned in question (3)?

Class (A): Land grant	22,838
		26,966
Class (B)		5,157
Total		32,123

The above figures are all minimum figures, as noted in the answer to question (2). The average total attendance would approach 35,000.

(5) If the bill is passed, how many of the institutions now giving military training are in a position to adopt the training proposed in the senior division, and what will be the probable annual output from these institutions of men who have taken the full training of the senior division?

If the bill is passed, 64 institutions now giving military instruction will be in a position to avail themselves of its provisons.

Estimates of the annual output in the immediate future made by several persons familiar with the subject vary from 3,000 to 5,000. My own view is that the figure can be conservatively put at 3,500. Undoubtedly as time goes on this annual output will be very considerably increased, not only because of the increased attendance at the various institutions but through the adoption of military training in other institutions as its advantages become more thoroughly appreciated.

(6) Under the plan proposed by the bill, what would be the probable total number of men available at the end of 10 years who had received the full training of the senior division?

Estimates made by those familiar with the situation vary from 38,000 to 50,000 or 100,000. My own opinion is that a conservative figure would be 45,000.

(7) What is the scope of military training at present given in civil educational institutions, and what is that proposed under the new bill?

Under the Morrill Act land-grant colleges are required to give military training. No specific legislation has been enacted defining what this military training shall be. Colleges in the different States have interpreted it differently. The War Department has tried to systematize the training by defining an acceptable minimum below which they will not assign Army officers as instructors. In this indirect manner some considerable degree of uniformity has been obtained. Some States go far beyond the required minimum which is as follows:

Close-order work of squad, company, and battalion; extended-order work for same; indoor target practice, including the use of sights and wind gauge; some advance, rear guard, and outpost practice; study of military tactics including some theoretical work covering the above ground; some instruction in map drawing and the theory of map making.

The training proposed under the plan of the new bill is the same as now given, but somewhat extended in the school, and supplemented by summer camps under the supervision of the War Department. The contemplated additional work is:

Theoretical and practical map making and road sketching; theory of field orders; theory of small problems, company and battalion. At the Army instruction camps under the supervision of the War Department there would be also long-range rifle practice, marches, construction of trenches, actual problems, camp life, and camp sanitation.

(8) What is the present equipment in the various schools now giving military training, and what assistance is given these schools by the United States Government?

The assistance given is of two kinds, military instructors and military materials and equipment.

Under the present laws only one officer may be detailed by the War Department for each college, university, or school regardless of the number of students to be taught. That is, no more officers may be detailed to an institution having 2,500 men under arms than to an institution having 150 men under arms. Retired officers may be detailed in addition, provided the institution will bear the cost of bringing the retired officers' pay up to the active rate. The total number of officers detailed in 1915 for teaching 32,123 students was 101. The distribution was such that some of the officers detailed had very light work, while others were completely overwhelmed.

The military materials and equipment consist of rifle, belt, and bayonet for each man; rifles and ammunition for gallery practice; a few institutions have a battery of field artillery. This equipment is all furnished by the War Department, but is taken from the more obsolete of the Army stores.

(9) What equipment would be required under the new bill, and what assistance is contemplated on the part of the United States Government?

In addition to a full infantry equipment for each man, a rifle, belt, bayonet, pack, etc., there would be, at each institution, a battery of artillery, a signal outfit, a first-aid outfit, and a motion-picture outfit for giving military instruction. It is contemplated also that there will be detailed at each institution as many United States officers, noncommissioned officers, and enlisted men, active or retired, as may, in the opinion of the President, be necessary to properly carry on the military instruction.

(10) Would the adoption of the plan provided for in the bill have any beneficial results other than those connected with military preparedness?

It is the conviction of those who have studied the question of military training and discipline from the educational standpoint that the effect of such training in character building and in promoting the efficiency and thoroughness of the individual has a value as great or greater than any other single study in the academic curriculum, and that its value to the country in this respect exceeds that from the standpoint of military preparedness. This conclusion is borne out by those who have had occasion to employ graduates of universities and colleges. There are certainly few thoughtful people who would not also agree that if there is any one thing of which the youth of the land at the present time stands in need in order to have a fuller appreciation of civic duty and a greater regard for law and authority it is discipline.

But there is a more immediate advantage which will accrue to the young man taking training under the provisions of the bill. He will receive an allowance of clothing, and, in addition to such allowance of clothing, he will, if taking the advance course of military training, receive a cash payment in lieu of and equivalent to the Army ration. This payment will amount to about $75 per year. These purely material advantages will be of very considerable moment to many students, especially those of limited means. In many cases such assistance toward defraying his expenses will constitute the determining factor with a young man of limited means as to whether or not he can take a college or university education.

(11) What is the cost of the plan proposed by the bill compared with others which have been proposed for the effective training of officers?

While not attempting to give exact figures, it is safe to say that the plan proposed under the bill is certainly by far the cheapest of any yet proposed, for the reason that it builds upon an existing system and therefore requires no new institutions and but comparatively slight increase in the number of instructors or military equipment, aside from that required by the summer camps.

(12) Has the European war demonstrated the fact that educated officers are necessary?

The European war has demonstrated the fact that educated officers are absolutely necessary. The greatest lack to-day amongst most, if not all, of the nations engaged in the European conflict is that of properly trained officers.

(13) What is the minimum length of time required to train a reasonably prepared soldier, and what that required to train a reasonably prepared officer?

One year of intensive training is necessary for the training of an enlisted man in the Infantry. A longer time is required in the Cavalry and Artillery.

To train an officer, starting with a college graduate over 21 years of age who has previously received no military training, would require two years of intensive training as a minimum in the particular branch of military work he took up. For a college graduate who has received the training contemplated for the senior division a year in the Army would make him a very excellent officer.

(14) How many officers are there in the Army and how many in the National Guard?

There are in the Army at the present time about 4,800 officers. In the National Guard about 8,800, most of whom can not be considered as properly trained for modern war. That is to say, in case of war there would be available a total of about 13,600 men presumably fitted for duty as officers, some of whom have not had adequate training.

(15) In view of the European conflict, what is the probable minimum Volunteer Army it would be necessary to raise in order to protect the United States in case of an attempted invasion, and how many officers would be necessary to properly officer this army?

In case of an attempted invasion of the United States it would be necessary to raise a Volunteer Army of at least 1,000,000 men. The officers necessary to properly officer this army would be about 60,500, as follows:

Line officers	30,000
20 per cent attrition	6,000
General and personal staff supply department	500
Recruiting, instruction camps, etc	12,000
Aviation, engineers, judge advocate, pay, signal, medical	12,000
Total	60,500

It should be borne in mind that, in addition to the officers necessary to officer and provide for the Army itself, there must be others engaged in recruiting and training men and officers to make up for wastage, as well as a certain allowance for wastage before the training and recruiting camps begin turning out any product.

(16) What provision would it be necessary for the War Department to make to insure effective attainment of the objects aimed at by this bill?

The plan of the bill can be made effective through regulations of the War Department putting the bill into effect, such as the method of selecting the seniors on the approval of the commandant of cadets, unannounced inspections during the year, and reports of officers at summer camps as to the relative preparedness of the cadets in attendance from various institutions, etc.

Hoping the answers given above are sufficiently explicit for your purpose,

Very truly, yours, GEO. L. CONVERSE,
Captain, United States Army, Retired,
Commandant of Cadets.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there are two things which seem to me to be most essential at this time. The first is to devise, if possible, some system for universal military training for young men without the feature of compulsory service. The second is to provide a very large number of trained officers available for service in the event the country should be involved in war. I favor the Gard amendment because I believe that it will accomplish more than any of the plans thus far proposed. Under the McKellar amendment but one college in each State is equipped and fitted for the training of young men to become reserve officers. Under the Gard amendment every educational institution in the United States can obtain the facilities to provide a course of military instruction for its students and to train and equip them to become officers. In educational institutions which have a collegiate course of four years a senior corps is organized, and at the end of the four years' course the student who has taken the course, with five hours a week in military training, when graduated serves six months as a temporary lieutenant assigned to a regular military organization of the Army. A corps of reserve officers of 50,000 of these graduates is created by appointment or selection by the President from such graduates; so that at the end of a very brief period 50,000 graduates of these colleges, who have had four years' instruction and six months' actual service in a military organization, have been trained and are available for use by the Government in time of necessity. Everyone of experience knows that a number of institutions would gladly avail themselves of the opportunity to establish a course and accept the services of a military officer detailed as an instructor under the proposed legislation. Not only in the land-grant colleges are young men found who because of lack of means are compelled to earn their way through college, but in every great institution of learning in the United States there are very many worthy young men who by grant of scholarships work their way through college and attain distinction both in their college career and in after life.

These young men can be given the opportunity to obtain with their studies thorough military training. Some of the large universities have already established courses and organized cadet corps, and we should give them an opportunity to benefit by the legislation to be enacted. [Applause.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to support the McKellar amendment. One of my reasons is that it has been given very careful and favorable consideration by the Committee on Military Affairs and the War Department, and it carries with it the strong indorsement of the late Secretary of War, Mr. Garrison.

It is proposed under the provisions of the Gard amendment to get something very valuable for nothing. In this general military preparation we are enacting for the benefit of the country we have to pay for everything which is important and necessary. If it is worth having, if it is essential, it is going to cost money. The McKellar proposition places these institutions under the direct control of the National Government and carries the necessary amount of money to insure success.

I know in the private military schools of the country, even under the Morrill Act, in some of the States there is thorough, efficient, and splendid work. In other sections the work does not measure up to the high standard of efficiency or good results. But under the McKellar amendment every institution affected will be under the direct control of the War Department, which means perfection and efficiency, not in one, but it means thorough military training and education of young officers in every State in this Union.

Under the McKellar proposition there is nothing in the way of a State agricultural college receiving the benefits of its provisions. Now, many of us, and I am in the lot, had a four-years' military training in the so-called agricultural college or university, receiving the benefit of Government aid under the Morrill Act. But there is or was no compulsion. The Government of the United States in case of stress or need can not demand the services of any of the young men who are educated in the State institutions having the benefit of the Morrill Act. But under the provisions of the McKellar amendment we have an ironclad contract, which can be enforced and can bring to the service of the military arm of this Government at the end of seven years 33,600 officers thoroughly trained under Regular Army officers.

Now, what did we find with reference to the European war? At a critical stage, so far as the Russian Army is concerned, they experienced a shortage in officers. There were so many killed, wounded, and missing that large sections of the Russian Army were without efficient officers to command and direct the men. Here is an absolute guarantee that our Government will have the necessary trained and experienced officers under contract, and that contract is worth, as a national investment, all the money carried in the proposed amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the Gard bill, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter I have received from Dr. C. A. Duniway, president of the University of Wyoming, setting forth the advantages of the plan proposed by the Gard bill over the plan of the McKellar bill.

The letter in question is as follows:

THE UNIVERSITY OF WYOMING,
Laramie, March 16, 1916.

HON. FRANK W. MONDELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MONDELL: I wish to thank you for your letter of March 10 with its inclosures. I had just recently seen a copy of the McKellar bill and my work on the executive committee of the National Association of State Universities had made me entirely familiar with the provisions of the Gard bill.

You ask me to give you my criticisms of the McKellar bill. These may be summarized as follows:

First, it looks to the creation of a new educational system rather than making use of existing institutions. Furthermore, the proposed McKellar system, with its combination of Federal and State control, the personnel of its governing boards, etc., seems to me distinctly a bad system.

The McKellar system of military schools would be one that must be definitely military, whereas, in my opinion, military preparedness should proceed along the line of giving people who are going into civil life enough of training so that they will be reasonably efficient when emergencies bring them into military service.

The McKellar system will be expensive both to the Federal Government and to the States if it can be carried out. The States will be obliged to vote large sums of money for buildings, equipment, grounds, and general maintenance.

The McKellar system, although it provides that existing land-grant colleges and universities might be utilized, contemplates definitely the creation of new institutions. The proposed system is at fault in ignoring work already done, institutions already created, whose grounds, buildings, equipment and faculties are available.

A wise policy would look to the improvement of the present system of military instruction in land-grant colleges and universities just enough to make their work thoroughly efficient. A small additional increment of expense and effort would make their graduates well-prepared material for service in a reserve army. In my opinion that is what the Nation now chiefly requires.

Let me commend to your particular attention the bill introduced by Senator CHAMBERLAIN, S. 4840. Sections 44 to 57, inclusive, of this bill are virtually the same thing as Mr. GARD'S bill. I hope sincerely that you and the other Members of the Wyoming delegation may give your support, at least, to the general principles and policy of the Gard bill, which is the same as the bill introduced by Senator POMERENE and likewise included as part of Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S bill.

Very truly,
C. A. DUNIWAY, President.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, on the first day of the present session I introduced a bill providing that the Government should furnish the necessary arms, tentage, and other equipment for military training and summer encampments in high schools which should maintain a voluntary cadet corps in accordance with regulations made by the Secretary of War. I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], because this amendment provides in large part for the same things provided by the bill which I introduced and is more in harmony with the provisions of the bill which we are now considering than my bill, and is in some respects more complete. In addition, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio has the indorsement of the War College Division, of the General Staff, of Gen. Scott, and of Gen. Wood.

Gentlemen must not get the idea that the amendment now under consideration limits the furnishing of arms, equipment, and tentage by the Federal Government to universities, land-grant and other colleges. As a matter of fact, the bill will make possible military training, including summer encampments, in 1,097 high schools in the country. It provides for furnishing such equipment to any school which has a male enrollment in excess of 100. There are 1,097 such high schools, in addition to numerous universities and colleges. These high schools have an enrollment of 399,234 young men who can, under the provisions of the amendment proposed, receive military training. Consequently the Gard amendment goes very much further than the McKellar amendment, and will reach approximately ten times as many young men annually.

If we are looking to the future, and this is the prerogative of statesmen, we must recognize that preparedness for national defense means more than merely providing for the hiring of some thousands of men to do our fighting for us. It means more than making soldiers. It means making men, men with sound bodies and sound minds, who have been taught the advantages of self-control and the necessity of decent restraints, who appreciate that patriotism requires the cheerful assumption of civic duties and responsibilities in time of peace as in time of war, men who have learned obedience, not the obedience of unthinking acquiescence but the thinking obedience of men who know the reason why. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, patriotism can not be taught by word of mouth, it must be felt. It comes from an association with those institutions and symbols of our national life which stand for Americanism. The amendment proposed will afford the machinery for making sound minds and sound bodies, and the environment and association which inculcate a sense of patriotism and loyalty to America and American ideals.

As I have previously stated, there is nothing new in the idea of military instruction in the schools of the country. Washington, D. C., has had it for 50 years, Boston for 32 years. It is now employed in practically all of the schools in the State of Wyoming. In an article for Everybody's Magazine for February, 1916, George Creel outlines the establishment of military training in the schools of Wyoming and its results. The article is worth the reading of every American. I wish I might incorporate it in its entirety, but I shall confine myself to quotations of some of its strong and pregnant sentences:

Service in the cadet corps of Wyoming is not compulsory, and there is no such thing as active recruiting, yet 90 per cent of the high-school population of the State has volunteered.

The essence of militarism is excessive armaments and a huge standing Army, while our purpose is no more than such training of youth during the school years as will permit them to devote their manhood to orderly civil pursuits. You can't cut militarism out with a moral precept; you've got to crowd it out with something better and finer.

The two types of military instruction—intelligent obedience and unthinking acquiescence—got a competitive test in the Boer War. The autocratic English system failed, and victory rested with the democratized, thinking citizen soldiers of Australia and Canada.

The lesson was not allowed to lose its vividness. In May, 1915, a second intercity tournament was held, this time with Rawlins added to the list, and again the Casper squad carried off first honors. Wall scaling calls for five trials, and three times that gallant little eight did the trick in six and one-fifth seconds, a fourth run in six and three-fifths, and the fifth run in six and four-fifths. Think of it! A 15-foot dash, a wall 8 feet 4 inches in height, each youngster with a heavy rifle in his hands, and the eight of them piling over in six and one-fifth seconds!

Is it any wonder that of the four-year boys in the Wyoming high schools only 5 out of every 25 have less than 40-inch chests?

Patriotism when unaccompanied by physical fitness is not the splendid and effective passion that the pacificist gentlemen would have us believe when they declare that America's call for defenders would find a million men in arms by nightfall. The records prove that 50 per cent of those who offer for enlistment can not be accepted, and that 50 per cent of those who are accepted die before the firing line is reached because they can not stand the hardships of the open.

The juvenile judges say: "We are the doctors, but Lieut. Steever is the sanitarian. We prescribe, but he prevents. There used to be about 8 per cent of delinquency among high-school boys, but the self-discipline and self-restraints of the cadets have wiped it out."

Another tremendous benefit lies in the complete elimination of class distinctions and caste lines. Snobbery finds it impossible to live in the democratic atmosphere of the Cadet Corps, for just as every squad has its weak and strong, so it is made up of the rich and poor, the Fauntleroys and the Smikes. A feature of the cadet year is the parties given by the sponsor or by the squad itself under the supervision of the sponsor, and it may be the case that the sponsor is a banker's daughter and the squad leader the son of a miner.

Another democratizing influence lies in the entertainment arrangements during the intercity tournaments. The boys and the sponsors are not sent to hotels, but are billeted on the members of the local corps. As a consequence the car conductor's son may be the guest in the home of the car conductor's president or the son of a magnate may be occupying the spare room in the cottage of a workman. The time to sow the seeds of democracy is in youth, before prejudices have had a chance to harden.

Mr. Creel quotes also a statement made by Maj. Gen. Wood, of the United States Army, in regard to the military value of training in the schools.

The statement of Maj. Gen. Wood is as follows:

Give these Steever cadets three months in a training camp for the purpose of coordinating what they have learned, and familiarizing them with the work in the mass, and you will have as fine and effective a body of troops as ever took arms in defense of a country. The high-school training gives the boys the sound physical base that is the first essential to any rational plan of national preparedness. It teaches the important lessons of abstinence and self-mastery, and forms the invaluable habits of discipline and cooperative effort. Above all, it grounds them in the fundamentals of military science and training, lifting them high above the raw volunteers who are the despair of officers in a crisis.

These quotations, as they express the purpose and the result of the Wyoming system, show more conclusively than anything that I could say the advantages both to the students and to the Government which would arise from a voluntary system of military training in the schools of the country.

I sincerely hope that the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. GARD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the Gard bill amendment provides virtually a military-extension course in our high schools, colleges, and universities. The main advantage of the bill is that the military instruction is optional. No student is obliged to undertake this military training unless it has his full approval, and no obligation is placed upon the National Government under this Gard bill other than the detail of Regular Army officers to instruct the youth in the junior and senior classes, and to furnish them with equipment. It extends military instruction to those institutions other than land-grant colleges and those receiving national aid under the Morrill Act. We all know that thousands of students at the leading colleges and universities of the country are only too willing to receive this instruction, and the bill provides the means for instructing these future reserve officers in the manual of arms.

There is one strong sentiment dominant in this House, and that is to provide by every practicable means for military training to all who wish to be equipped, in case of eventualities, to be efficient soldiers, and the other is to avail ourselves of every opportunity of training those who are qualified mentally and physically to be officers in case of need. These men who volunteer in these cadet regiments, if they see fit to enlist for a period of 10 years for appointment in the officers' reserve corps, will then have the option for a period not exceeding six weeks each summer to receive direct instruction in military tactics at encampments, and then be subject to call at any time in that period in the defense of country. [Applause.]

It is extending the policy that proved so popular and was so successful last summer at the citizen military training camps. Many of those who showed their willingness to respond to call were college graduates engaged in commercial, industrial, and professional work.

We should not deny to any student the possibility of such training which tends to his physical, mental, and patriotic development, and which will provide a large force of volunteer officers in case of war from those mentally trained to command and direct.

The bill provides military training to all high-grade students with patriotic fervor to prepare for the country's call when needed. It provides preparedness of the best kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I would like to have your attention just for a few moments. I want to correct an impression. There is nothing in this bill of mine that aims at land-grant colleges or takes anything from them in any manner, shape, or form. I do not know how the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] could have made a statement like the one made by him. He can not have read either bill. If he had read either one of them he would have known they do not refer to the land-grant colleges in any way.

The only possible effect it can have on the land-grant colleges is a beneficial one. It may be that his particular land-grant college can not accept the benefits of the act, but most of the other land-grant colleges can accept the benefits of the act.

Now, another thing: The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says my bill will be a charity to the boys receiving the benefit of the act. It would be on exactly the same principle upon which the boys at West Point are educated. That is not a charity. Those boys receive their education and are required in turn to give their services to the Government. That is exactly what these boys are required to do under my bill. My bill gives the worthy and deserving boy the opportunity for education.

Now, I want to say that if there is anything here that interferes with any institution of learning already in existence, I would not be for it. I know what it means to have to work for a college education. I know how much it would mean to the worthy boys in your districts—each one of you, my friends—if they could have the opportunity that is offered to them in the bill that I propose here to get an education, to get a splendid collegiate education, and one of the best forms of military training that could be given them. It would not be a charity. They would agree to serve their Government as Army officers at any time they are called upon within seven years after their graduation in return for their education. Is that charity? If that is charity, then we are charitable to West Pointers. The situation in principle is precisely the same.

Gentlemen of the committee, I would call your attention to this fact, that this Government of ours contributes comparatively nothing to the cause of education. The five or six million dollars that we give to the land-grant colleges of our country and the millions that we expend every year on West Point are all that we contribute to the cause of education, in substance. This plan of mine provides for only four millions more, and while it provides for only four millions more, it gives us reserve officers for the Army that we can count upon. Will any gentleman answer me from his seat, How many officers are you going to have under the Gard bill, if you insert it here? Will the gentleman who is the author of the Gard bill say how many reserve Army officers his bill will give the country? You gentlemen are insisting upon a larger enlisted force. What efforts are you making to secure a larger reserve of officers that we can count upon when our country is in trouble? Will any gentleman answer me that question, if you pass this miserable makeshift? I do not mean that in an offensive sense, but in this sense, that while it may be a good thing for the colleges and the universities, it means nothing except what you are getting right now.

Why, gentlemen say they graduated at certain land-grant institutions and that they furnished splendid military training. I myself was educated at a school of the same kind. I was captain of one of the companies at my college, just as was the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I believe I would have made a good soldier, because these institutions are doing a good work. But can the Government depend upon them now? You have no hold on them. You are contributing to them, but you can not utilize their services. That is the report of the War College. That is the report of the War Department. You have no effective force of officers. It all depends upon the willingness of these graduates to serve. Are they going to serve? Are they going to tie themselves up in a reserve after they graduate? They receive nothing at the hands of the Government themselves. Why should they do it?

Ah, but when the Government takes them and educates them and uses them from every county in the United States, selects them according to merit, not as charity students, but as students that the Government has chosen to do its work, giving them the best kind of an education, that the Government only can give, and requiring of them their services, you have a real preparedness plan—one is a coordinated plan. Under one you have a reserve list of officers that you can depend on and under the other one—I still pause for a reply.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will answer the gentleman. I will tell him that in the little village where I live when enlisted men were called for in the Spanish-American War they accepted and accepted, and finally there were 300 great, big, fine, stalwart students of the university standing there pleading to go in, and they were rejected because they had too many already.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, gentlemen, if you are going to depend on a little village like that where Brother TRIBBLE lives, well and good; but——

Mr. TRIBBLE. There are a great many of them throughout the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not believe that we ought to depend on the village schools. We ought to educate our boys. We ought to pick them and choose them. We ought to educate them with the purpose of having them become reserve officers. And I will say right now you will find that if you pass the Gard measure all it means is that you are going to give certain perquisites to institutions that are already educating these boys.

My friend from Ohio, Mr. FESS, misunderstood me when I said it limited these benefits to agricultural colleges. It does not. It includes all schools that give military training. It gives certain perquisites to the colleges, but it does not give the boys anything, and it does not give the Government anything. In this time of trouble we are not so much interested in the boys as we ought to be, but we are interested, gentlemen, in building up a defense for our country, and the only way you can get an effective force for defense is to have well-trained officers.

As I understand now, one of the principal advantages that one of the belligerent nations in Europe enjoys is in the fact that it has splendidly trained and equipped army officers. Why, it sends them to another allied nation and puts them over foreign troops, and they do well. Why? Because those army officers are well trained. And if we ever have trouble in this country—which God grant we shall never have—we will find that the graduates of these schools over which the Government has no control whatsoever can not be depended on, and we are going to find ourselves in a woeful lurch. Have you any control over the institutions that are benefited by the Gard bill? What control have you? I remember what kind of control we had at our land-grant college. We had an Army officer, it is true, but he had no control over that institution, no control whatever over the military training or any other kind of training.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Just what does the gentleman mean by control over the institution?

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean that the commandant of cadets—the Army officer sent to the college—is in most cases a member of the faculty, but he does not shape the military policy or any other policy. He drills the cadets and teaches them on matters of drill, if he gets along with them.

Mr. MANN. Under the existing law?

Mr. McKELLAR. Under the existing law; but he has no possible control over the cadets other than that given him by the board of trustees. Under the plan that I have suggested, the Government holds the control over the military training. Why? It is because the Government will not give the amount of money that the institution would otherwise be entitled to, unless the students do the work.

Mr. GARD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the Gard amendment for many reasons, chief among which is the fact that it revivifies the Morrill Act. There are now 67 colleges receiving benefits under that act where there is more or less military training. That military training now provided for in these institutions is extended by the Gard amendment. It has been said here that no good will come to the Government, because of the fact that the Government has no control over these young men. All the Government has to do—and this Gard amendment does that—is to give to the young men who have had the opportunity of graduating from these military institutions with this military training a chance to offer their services. This amendment gives them the opportunity to offer their services to this Government, and it is my prediction that the full quota will be offered all the time. Whenever the opportunity has been offered to these young men heretofore it has been accepted by many of them. Purdue University, in the State of Indiana, has furnished some of the brightest intellects in the Regular Army of the United States to-day. The young officer who first scaled the wall of Peking in the Boxer War was a man who received his military education at Purdue University under the Morrill Act. Half a dozen of these young men are now officers in the United States Army, and there are thousands more of them who will offer their services when needed, for these 67 institutions are turning out 25,000 graduates every year, and of that number a very great many of them would, if chance was afforded them, go into the Army and become a part of the officers of that Army. The Gard bill provides that they may have the opportunity, and with the opportunity afforded them they will avail themselves of that chance and go to the colors. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HELVERING].

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. H. J. Waters, president of the Kansas State Agricultural College, in which he sets forth his objections to the so-called McKellar bill under several heads. First, he says it is not practical; second, that it is too costly to the State; third, that it would create two groups of students on the campus; fourth, that it gives too much power to the governing board; fifth, that the entrance requirements are too limited; and sixth, that he objects to 48 West Points in the United States.

I will conclude my remarks by inserting his letter:

KANSAS STATE AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE,
Manhattan, March 9, 1916.

Hon. GUY T. HELVERING,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HELVERING: I think H. R. 11872 by Mr. McKellar, as contained in Report No. 243 on Military Training Schools, does not provide a practical plan for training military men in the colleges of the country. The bill grants more assistance to the student than is necessary.

The State is required to do more than it would willingly do. It must grant $40,000 a year and provide dormitories and a mess hall. In this State, at least, no such conveniences exist, and at any college it would take $150,000 or $200,000 to provide these facilities.

It is a bad plan to have two groups of students on the same campus. The students of one group would be paying their own way and yet be required to take military training along with the other subjects, and the other group would be pampered, fed, and coddled by the State and the Government.

One of the principal objections to the bill is that the governing board, consisting of the Secretary of War, an Army officer, and a civilian appointed by the President, would have too much power with respect to the entrance requirements to these educational institutions and to the conditions for graduation. The entrance requirements as laid down in the bill are absurd. They do not represent a half year of high-school work. In fact, in many of the better schools of the country all of the work prescribed for admission is done in the grades. The bill further provides that at the end of three years, a large part of which is military, a degree corresponding to the degree of bachelor of science or of bachelor of arts must be conferred upon these men. What would the other students of the school think when they are required to spend four years in an accredited high school and four years in college before they are granted a similar degree to that which the military students obtain in three years from the grade schools?

I do not think we need to multiply our West Points by 48.

A plan of scholarships amounting to, say, $100 a year for each of 300 students a year in each State college, and requiring these men to take a minimum amount of military science and tactics of one hour a day throughout their course, and to take a liberal amount of mathematics and certain courses in engineering corresponding somewhat to the course required in West Point, and then, in consideration of the assistance given these young men by the Government in procuring their education, require them to become a part of the Federal reserve army and require them to report for duty a month four of the seven years which they will be members of the reserve army, and you have met all the objects which would be accomplished by the McKellar bill and at less than half the expense, and with none of the confusion and objection and discriminations which are inherent in the McKellar bill.

Cordially, yours,

H. J. WATERS, President.

Mr. GARD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, like other Members I modestly admit having received my military training in a land-grant college, at Ames, Iowa. My sons have received their military training in the same way in another land-grant school, the University of Nebraska. These land-grant colleges are known by their fruits. They train the youth in the military art, and the youth in turn train the best officers in the country. Gen. John J. Pershing, the man selected by the military authorities of the United States to lead the punitive expedition into Mexico, obtained military training at West Point, but the best training that he obtained was in the several years that he occupied the position of military instructor at the University of Nebraska.

To-day, at the head of that expedition into Mexico, he is carrying out the will of the American people, buoyed up by their hope that he will be successful; and by his side is a gallant aid, a graduate of the University of Nebraska, Martin C. Shallenberger, the son of a member of the Military Committee of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time remaining to my allotment to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee [Mr. HAY].

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the provision in the bill is known as the cadet companies provision. It was placed in the bill by somebody in the War Department, and the committee, being anxious to have something from which we could get officers, accepted that provision, at the same time not thinking that it was as good a provision as we ought to have.

I have carefully studied the proposition offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. He introduced the bill some time ago, and I am satisfied that that provision is the best that we can adopt for the purpose of obtaining young men well trained to perform the duties of officers of the Army. For that reason I shall support the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], and I hope it will be the pleasure of the committee to do the same. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN and Mr. GARD demanded a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may we have the question stated, so that we will understand it?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee; that is to say, the question is on the McKellar amendment.

Mr. MANN. The McKellar amendment to the Gard amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. To the Gard amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 97.

Accordingly the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article by Capt. George L. Converse, commandant of the Ohio State University.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman already has that privilege.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That for the purpose of securing a reserve of officers available for service as temporary officers in the Regular Army, as provided for in this act and in section 8 of the act approved April 25, 1914, as officers of the Quartermaster Corps and other staff corps and departments, as officers for recruit rendezvous and depots, and as officers of volunteers, there shall be organized, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, an officers' reserve corps of the Regular Army. Except as otherwise herein provided, a member of the officers' reserve corps shall not be subject to call for service in time of peace, and whenever called upon for service shall not, without his consent, be so called in a lower grade than that held by him in said reserve corps.

The President is authorized to appoint and commission as reserve officers of the various arms, corps, and departments, in all grades up to and including that of major, such citizens of the United States as may have completed one year's satisfactory service in the cadet companies provided for in this act, and such other citizens as, upon examination prescribed by the President, are found physically, mentally, and morally qualified to hold such commissions: Provided, That after three years from the passage of this act original appointments as reserve officers of Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, and Infantry shall, if the President so direct, be made only from such citizens as shall have satisfactorily completed one year's service in cadet companies of the respective arms: Provided further, That the proportion of officers in any arm, corps, or department of the officers' reserve corps shall not exceed the proportion for the same grade in the same arm, corps, or department of the Regular Army, except that the number commissioned in the lowest authorized grade in any arm, corps, or department of the officers' reserve corps shall not be limited.

All persons now carried as duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903, shall, for a period of three years after the passage of this act, be eligible for appointment in the officers' reserve corps in the arm, corps, or department for which they have been found qualified without further examination, except a physical examination, subject to the limitations as to age and rank herein prescribed.

No person shall, except as hereinafter provided, be appointed or reappointed a second lieutenant in the officers' reserve corps after he has reached the age of 32 years, a first lieutenant after he has reached the age of 36 years, a captain after he has reached the age of 40 years, or a major after he has reached the age of 45 years. When an officer of the reserve corps reaches the age limit fixed for appointment or reappointment in the grade in which he is commissioned he shall be honorably discharged from the service of the United States and be entitled to retain his official title and, on occasions of ceremony, to wear the uniform of the highest grade he held in the officers' reserve corps: Provided, That nothing in the foregoing provisions as to the ages of officers shall apply to the appointment or reappointment of officers of the Quartermaster and Engineer Corps and Medical Department of said reserve corps.

To the extent provided for from time to time by appropriations for this specific purpose the Secretary of War is authorized to order reserve officers to duty with troops or at field exercises or for instruction for periods not to exceed 15 days in any one calendar year, and while so serving such officers shall receive the pay and allowances of their grade: Provided, That, with the consent of the reserve officers concerned, and within the limit of funds available for the purpose, such periods of duty may be extended for reserve officers as the Secretary of War may direct.

One year after the passage of this act the Medical Reserve Corps as now constituted by law shall cease to exist. Members thereof may be commissioned in the officers' reserve corps, subject to the provisions of this act, or may be honorably discharged from the service. The Secretary of War may, in time of peace, order first lieutenants of the officers' reserve corps, with their consent, to active duty in the service of the United States in such numbers as the public interests may require and the funds appropriated may permit, and may relieve them from such duty when their services are no longer necessary.

The President alone is authorized to appoint and commission all officers of the officers' reserve corps, such commissions to be in force for a period of five years unless sooner terminated in the discretion of the President. Such officers may be recommissioned, either in the same or higher grades, for successive periods of five years, subject to such examinations and qualifications as the President may prescribe and to the age limits prescribed herein: Provided, That officers of the officers' reserve corps shall have rank therein in the various arms, corps, and departments of said reserve corps according to grades and to length of service in their grades.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment. On page 39, line 25, after the word "Engineers," strike out the word "Corps," and, on line 26, strike out the word "department" and insert the word "branches."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to page 38, lines 4 to 17, down to the proviso. The cadet corps has been stricken out, and the cadet companies has been stricken out.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all on page 38, beginning with line 4, down to and including the word "further," on line 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, strike out all of lines 4 to 17, including the word "further" on line 18.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, on second thought that is not right. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. I offer the following amendment: On line 8, page 38, strike out the words "in the cadet companies provided for in this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "in the cadet companies provided for in this act."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman indicate if that amendment is adopted what is the meaning of the phraseology "has completed one year's satisfactory service"?

Mr. KAHN. I think the whole provision ought to go out.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass by this paragraph, and I will fix it up to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to pass by the paragraph. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. The section or the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman why the Medical Reserve Corps is abolished.

Mr. HAY. What does the gentleman want to know?

Mr. BENNET. In the latter part of this section, page 40, lines 11 to 21, it says:

One year after the passage of this act the Medical Reserve Corps, as now constituted by law, shall cease to exist. Members thereof may be commissioned in the officers' reserve corps, subject to the provisions of this act, or may be honorably discharged from the service.

That abolishes the Medical Corps in which physicians and surgeons in the city which I have the honor to represent in part have taken a great deal of interest.

Mr. HAY. It provides for their going into the officers' reserve corps and gives them one year in which to do it; and they have this advantage, that in the reserve corps now they can only be appointed first lieutenants, while in the officers' reserve corps, provided for in this act, they can be promoted to the rank of major. I will say to the gentleman that the Surgeon General whose anxiety about this corps is very great approves of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BENNET. The Medical Reserve Corps itself does not oppose it; there is no opposition from the Medical Reserve Corps?

Mr. HAY. Not that I know of; and the Surgeon General of the Army thinks that the medical profession in the country are better taken care of than they are under the present law.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question or two.

Mr. HAY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Will there be as great an opportunity for the utilization of the experience of medical men in the case of an emergency under this bill as under the other?

Mr. HAY. Greater.

Mr. MADDEN. So in case of war we would be able to take advantage of the experience of all the men in the medical profession for taking care of the wounded soldiers.

Mr. HAY. All of those who would go into this corps.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to find out how the ages came to be fixed as they are. On page 39 there is quite a difference between the ages here for the appointment of second lieutenants and the ages fixed elsewhere.

Mr. HAY. He wanted to be more liberal; wanted to get more people into the reserve corps.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are some very efficient young men past 27 who would not be accepted in the regular service.

Mr. HAY. No; but they could go into the reserve corps.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is a leeway given in the reserve corps which does not exist in the regular service? Is that in the law?

Mr. HAY. No; it was fixed by the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is the committee's judgemnt; that is, the ages were fixed on the judgment of the committee?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And it is more liberal in this reserve corps than in the regular service?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take occasion to state that all of section 19 is agreed to now, except the paragraph beginning in line 4 on page 38, which has been passed over temporarily.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. That when war is imminent or upon a declaration of war the President may order officers of the reserve corps, subject to such subsequent physical examinations as he may prescribe, to temporary duty with the Regular Army in grades thereof which can not, for the time being, be filled by promotion, as officers in volunteer or such other organizations, as may be authorized by law, or as officers of recruit rendezvous and depots, in such numbers as may be authorized by law. While such reserve officers are on such service they shall, by virtue of their commissions as reserve officers, exercise command appropriate to their grade and rank in the organizations to which they are assigned, and be entitled to the pay and allowances of the corresponding grades in the Regular Army with increase of pay for length of active service as now allowed by law for officers of the Regular Army, from the date upon which they are required by the terms of their order to obey the same: Provided, That officers so ordered to active service shall take temporary rank among themselves and in their grade in the organizations to which assigned according to the dates of orders placing them on active service; and may be promoted, in accordance with such rank, to vacancies in volunteer organizations or to temporary vacancies in the Regular Army, thereafter occurring in the organizations in which they are serving: And provided further, That officers of the reverse corps shall not be entitled to retirement or retired pay, and shall be entitled to pension only for disability incurred in the line of duty and while in active service.

Any officer of the reserve corps ordered to active service by the Secretary of War while holding a reserve commission shall, from the time he is required by the terms of his order to obey the same, be subject to the laws and regulations for the government of the Army of the United States, in so far as they are applicable to officers whose permanent retention in the military service is not contemplated.

And there shall be eligible for enlistment in the Regular Army reserve any person who is a citizen of the United States or who has declared his intention of becoming a citizen thereof, who by the nature of his civil occupation or profession is thereby qualified for duty in the Quartermaster, Engineer, or Signal Corps, or in the Medical or Ordnance Departments, and who is physically qualified for the duties of a soldier and not over 35 years of age, who shall enlist for one of said corps or departments for a period of four years. That for the purpose of securing an additional reserve of enlisted men for military service with the Engineer, Signal, and Quartermaster Corps and the Ordnance and Medical Departments of the Regular Army, an Enlisted Reserve Corps, to consist of such number of enlisted men of same grade or grades as are now, or as may hereafter be, authorized by law for the Regular Army reserve, or as may be designated by the President from time to time, is hereby authorized, such authorization to be effective on and after the 1st day of July, 1916.

That there may be enlisted in the grades hereinbefore specified, for a period of four years, under such rules as may be prescribed by the President, citizens of the United States or persons who have declared their intentions to become citizens of the United States, subject to such physical, educational, and practical examination as may be prescribed in said rules. That for men enlisting in said grades certificates of enlistment in the Enlisted Reserve Corps shall be issued by The Adjutant General of the Army, but no such man shall be enlisted in said corps unless he shall be found physically, mentally, and morally qualified to hold such certificates and unless he shall be between the ages of 18 and 45 years. The certificates so given shall confer upon the holders when called into active service or for purposes of instruction and training, and during the period of such active service, instruction, or training all the authority, rights, and privileges of like grades of the Regular Army. Enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps shall have rank in said corps according to the dates of their certificates of enlistment therein and when called into active service or when called out for purposes of instruction or training shall rank next below all other enlisted men of like grades in the United States Army.

That to the extent provided from time to time by appropriations the Secretary of War may order enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps to active service for purposes of instruction or training for periods not to exceed 15 days in any one calendar year: Provided, That with the consent of such enlisted men and within the limits of funds available for such purposes such periods of active service may be extended for such number of enlisted men as may be deemed necessary.

That enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps shall receive the pay and allowances of their respective grades only when ordered into active service, including the time required for actual travel from their homes to the places to which ordered and return to their homes: Provided, That said enlisted men shall not be entitled to retirement or retirement pay, nor shall they be entitled to pensions except for physical disability incurred in line of duty while in active service or while traveling under orders of competent authority to or from designated places of duty.

That the uniform to be worn by enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps shall be the same as prescribed for enlisted men of the Army Reserve, and that in lieu of any money allowance for clothing there shall be issued to each enlisted man of the Enlisted Reserve Corps in time of peace such articles of clothing and equipment as the President may direct: Provided, That any clothing or other equipment issued to any enlisted man of the said corps shall remain the property of the United States, and in case of loss or destruction of any article thereof the articles so lost or destroyed shall be replaced by issues to the enlisted man and the value thereof deducted from any pay due or to become due him, unless it shall be made to appear that such loss or destruction was not due to neglect or other fault on his part: Provided further, That any clothing or other equipment issued to enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps which has become unserviceable through ordinary wear and tear in the service of the United States shall be received back by the United States and serviceable like articles issued in lieu thereof; And provided further, That when enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps are discharged or otherwise separated from the service all arms, equipage, clothing, and other property issued to them shall be accounted for under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

That any enlisted man of the Enlisted Reserve Corps ordered to active service or for purposes of instruction or training shall, from the time he is required by the terms of the order to obey the same, be subject to the laws and regulations for the government of the Army of the United States.

That the Secretary of War is authorized to discharge any enlisted member of the Enlisted Reserve Corps when his services are no longer required, or when he has by misconduct unfitted himself for further service in the said corps: Provided, That any enlisted man of said corps who shall be ordered upon active duty as herein provided and who shall willfully fail to comply with the terms of the order so given him shall, in addition to any other penalty to which he may be subject, forfeit his certificate.

That when a volunteer force is authorized the President may order enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, in such numbers and at such times as may be considered necessary, to active service with the Army, and while on such service members of said corps shall exercise command appropriate to their several grades and rank in the organizations to which they are assigned and shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of the corresponding grades in the Regular Army, with increase of pay for length of service as now allowed by law for the Regular Army: Provided, That upon a call by the President for a volunteer force the members of the Enlisted Reserve Corps may be mustered into the service of the United States as volunteers for duty with the Army in the grades held by them in the said corps, and shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of the corresponding grades in the Regular Army, with increase of pay for length of service, as now provided by law for the Regular Army: And provided further, That enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps shall not acquire by virtue of issuance of certificates of enlistment to them a vested right to be mustered into the volunteer service of the United States.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 42, line 4, after the word "and," insert the word "they."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, in connection with this amendment, about the language at the beginning of section 20, where the expression is used "when war is imminent." Is there any technical definition of that term well recognized?

Mr. HAY. I do not think there is.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether there has been any determination of it at any time?

Mr. HAY. I do not.

Mr. MANN. Has not this language been in the law for many years?

Mr. HAY. It has.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether it would require, in the opinion of the War Department, a proclamation by the President?

Mr. HAY. I think not.

Mr. MANN. Or an order?

Mr. HAY. Of course it would require an order from him to authorize the taking in of anyone into the active service of the United States Army; but, I take it, the language means that if in the judgment of the President, from the information that he may have from negotiations that he may be carrying on with some other country, he thinks war is imminent, then the Congress confers upon him the power to do this.

Mr. MANN. Would it not require him in an order to say so?

Mr. HAY. To issue a proclamation?

Mr. MANN. Not issue a proclamation, but say in an order to the War Department, "war being imminent," or something to that effect?

Mr. HAY. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that it would, and it seems to me very desirable, if possible, where the President thinks that war is imminent, that he might act without making any declaration of that fact. Even a mobilization of troops in a country sometimes is a practical declaration of war. That is what started the war in Europe.

Mr. HAY. I think that after the word "when" we might insert the words "in the judgment of the President."

Mr. MANN. But he would have to express his judgment, and that would make it sure he would have to express his judgment.

Mr. HAY. I do not know how you are going to get at it.

Mr. MANN. I am not seeking to amend it. I am asking the gentleman, hoping that if there be a way to do it, so that the President may issue the order without any statement on his part that war is imminent, that way may be provided, so that he shall not be criticized for that thereafter.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that we discussed this matter very fully in the committee in framing the first section of the bill, and we concluded that if we used the words "and when in the judgment of the President war becomes imminent," that that would confer upon him the power to use the discretion given him throughout the bill, to do anything that was necessary to get ready, and that it was not necessary to issue a proclamation or to issue any public order, that he should simply say to the Secretary of War, "Go ahead and do so-and-so," whatever he might think necessary.

Mr. MANN. I can not agree that he would have that power without expressing in some way his judgment or opinion that war was imminent, which I think ought to be avoided, if possible, because the President must protect himself under the language of the bill.

Mr. HAY. What would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MANN. I give it up.

Mr. HAY. We have done the best we could.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticizing.

Mr. HAY. I know that.

Mr. MANN. I did not know but that there might be some settled construction of the language in the War Department.

Mr. HAY. No; there is not.

Mr. MANN. I have not made any inquiry. It has been in the law for a long time.

Mr. HAY. It has been in the law a long time, but it never has been passed upon by any court, so far as I know.

Mr. MANN. I think the President, when information comes to him in reference to matters which he thinks are very serious, ought to be able without publishing the fact to commence to add to the Army.

Mr. HAY. I think he can do so under this language.

Mr. MANN. I doubt whether he would feel protected in doing it without a statement in some way that war was imminent.

Mr. HAY. He might put it in an order directed to the Secretary of War, which order would not necessarily be published.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not think the substitution of the word "emergency" for the word "war" would answer the purpose—whenever an emergency exists which, in the judgment of the President should require, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it would make any difference, because if the President said there was an emergency existing, the effect would be the same. I do not undertake to say what the language ought to be. I do not know. I do think, however, that when a situation is so delicate that the President thinks war is imminent, he ought not to make it public, he ought not to say so, so that anyone knows that that is his opinion, that he ought to be able to go ahead without saying so.

Mr. HAY. I do not think he would be required to say so under the terms of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I must confess I think he would be required to say so.

Mr. HAY. He might say so in an order to the Secretary of War, but it would not follow that that order would be a public order. He very often gives orders that are not public.

Mr. MANN. That might be. I do not know about that.

I hope the gentlemen up in the War Department will give attention to this discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, line 4, after the word "of," insert the following:
"The branches of the Army reserve corresponding to."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 45, line 9, after the word "corps," insert the words "except corps insignia."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 13, after the word "Army" insert the following:

"And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to issue to members of the enlisted reserve corps and to persons who have participated in at least one encampment for the military instruction of citizens conducted under the auspices of the War Department, distinctive rosettes or knots designed for wear with civilian clothing, and whenever a rosette or knot issued under the provisions of this section shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use without fault or neglect upon the part of the person to whom it is issued, the Secretary of War shall cause a new rosette or knot to be issued to such person without charge therefor. Any person who is not an enlisted man of the enlisted reserve corps or who shall not have participated in at least one encampment for the military instruction of citizens conducted under the auspices of the War Department who shall wear such rosette or knot shall be guilty of misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not exceeding $300 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the rosettes, providing they are not yellow.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move the adoption of the amendment. I desire to say that the purpose of the amendment is this: This enlisted reserve corps, in my opinion, is one of the most important features of this bill. It provides for the enlistment of men in a reserve force that will be invaluable in time of war. Men who are telegraph linemen and operators, telephone linemen, aviators, and men in that line of endeavor could be enlisted in the Signal Corps; men who are chauffeurs, railroad engineers, switchmen, and brakemen could be enlisted in the Quartermaster's Corps; men who are civil engineers and electrical engineers could be enlisted in the Engineering Corps; men who are employed in munition factories and factories for the manufacture of rifles, shotguns, and pistols can be enlisted in the Ordnance Department; drug clerks and men who have had experience in hospitals can be enlisted in the Medical Department. In that way, in case of war, we would have a very large reserve force of American citizens who could respond immediately to the call of the President and do signal service for the country. This amendment authorizes those citizens to wear in the lapel of their coats a little badge showing that they are in the reserve force of their country; that is the sole purpose of the amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. I notice what the gentleman says about these badges. Are we to understand that we are liable to have a renewal of the War of the Roses?

Mr. KAHN. There will not even be the scent of the roses.

Mr. SLOAN. One thing further. Might not the members of the Committee on Military Affairs be entitled to wear the rosettes among the others?

Mr. KAHN. If they enlist, they will be; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. KAHN), there were—ayes 82, noes 3.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 41, line 8, after the word "that," strike out the words "when war is imminent or upon the declaration of war" and insert in lieu thereof the words "when in his judgment the public interests may require."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I am not afraid to trust the President of the United States and I do not think the President of the United States would exercise this power unless there was a necessity for it, but I do think that this House ought to hesitate a long while before we in words yield up one of our constitutional powers. I think if we leave the language in the bill, to which attention has been called by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], we practically, so long as this law remains on the statute books, put it in the power of the President to force Congress to make a declaration of war, for if there is any consistency in legislation, if we confer upon the President by statute the power to determine when war is imminent, then it is incumbent upon the Congress of the United States to declare war.

This confers upon this President and succeeding Presidents, upon the office of President, a power to-day exercised only by the Czar of Russia and the Sultan of Turkey. Talk about the Kaiser! Talk about the King of England! Neither of them has the power to do it. The Kaiser could not do this without the Bundesrath, and the King of England could not do this without the Parliament; but now it is seriously proposed that the Congress of the United States shall abrogate one of its sacred constitutional powers by statute. Why, our predecessors here fought for these rights. When this Congress was Democratic once before, in the early seventies, they exercised their power to prevent, as they could under the Constitution, appropriations for the Army extending over a period longer than two years, and by exercising that constitutional power compelled then a course of action upon the then President of the United States.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Could Congress under the Constitution delegate to the President the power to declare war?

Mr. BENNET. Of course not; but there is such a thing as a moral obligation; and when the Congress of the United States so far forgets its high place in the triumvirate of government, its equal part amongst the three, as to turn over in advance—because that is what we are doing—to the President of the United States the power to declare war, why there would be a moral obligation upon this Congress, and it seems to me, as long as it remains unrepealed, upon every Congress, to back up the President whenever he issued a proclamation that a state of war was imminent.

Mr. FESS. A question that frequently has been in my mind is whether the President could, under the Constitution, do what might compel Congress to declare war.

Mr BENNET. I can say, Mr. Chairman, that President Polk, in connection with the Mexican War, as the gentleman from Ohio knows, took the Army of the United States into Mexico, and then notified Congress that a state of war existed by the action of Mexico. Of course, the President of the United States could go a long way, and, of course, there might occasion arise when Congress, even against its better judgment, would have to back him up. I am willing to trust this President and succeeding Presidents, occupants of the office, but I am not willing to sit quietly by as one Member of the House and to see us vote to abrogate as far as we can one of the constitutional privileges.

Mr. HULBERT. The gentleman's objection is in line with the inquiry I had in mind and which I propounded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Does the gentleman feel that the amendment he has offered will be effective unless there is an amendment also contemplated to line 7 on the first page of the bill, where the same language is again used?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BENNET. Of course, my colleague may be entirely right, as he usually is, but there is no use crying over spilled milk. We are up to section 20 now, and we can not go back to section 1 except by unanimous consent. Possibly if we carry this amendment we can go back by unanimous consent. I did not notice the language in section 1, if it is there, but now that the attention of the House has been called by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to what we are doing, I hope that the Committee of the Whole House or the Committee on Military Affairs will do something to prevent us from taking this, as I regard it, humiliating step.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Referring to the Mexican situation, we had no declaration of war?

Mr. BENNET. No.

Mr. FESS. All Congress said was that "Whereas a state of war exists," and so forth. How did we get into that situation?

Mr. BENNET. The President took our Army into Mexico, and of course when it went there against the wishes of the Mexican Republic they resisted it, and the then President of the United States, Mr. Polk, notified Congress that a state of war existed. Congress had only two alternatives. It could order the troops back, which it had the right to do, or it could coincide with the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes? I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York who determines under this bill, as he understands it, the imminence of war?

Mr. BENNET. You mean under the language as it is in the act?

Mr. SLOAN. As it is in the act; yes.

Mr. BENNET. I think that is left absolutely vague, but I think if the President of the United States wanted to assume that Congress had given him the right to determine whether war was imminent he would be justified, under the language, to do so. I do not know. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] pointed out that there was no distinction at present, and that the language was vague and unsatisfactory. But there is a danger. There is nothing vague about this, that the Congress of the United States, if it permits this language to stay in, is, so far as it can, abrogating the constitutional power to declare war.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that, on page 1, the language is "when in the judgment of the President war becomes imminent."

Mr. BENNET. That is a little bit better; but even that, I think, could be improved upon.

Mr. SLOAN. I called attention to that by an interrogatory which I submitted to the chairman of the committee under section 1, raising practically the same question, and I will ask the gentleman from New York if his amendment makes this clear as to who determines the imminence of war, whether it be a declaration to be made by this country, or one through diplomatic means he has discovered as coming from abroad?

Mr. BENNET. My amendment does. It strikes the language out and substitutes this language: "Whenever in the judgment of the President the public interests require," without any word about war.

Mr. SLOAN. Does not the gentleman think that is giving the President of the United States, whoever he may be—having full confidence in the President—a great deal of power beyond what the Constitution gives him?

Mr. BENNET. It is giving him a great deal of power, but giving it in a proper way, without in words abrogating the power of Congress.

Mr. SLOAN. Can we in fact give him in a proper way more than the constitutional power does?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the language contained in the bill is the language that has been in these bills for a very long time. I do not remember what language was carried in the first bill of this character, but I do know that the language of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] would give unlimited power to the President to raise armies in time of peace whenever he might think he wanted an army raised. There can be no question about that construction of language. I do not imagine that we want to confer that power upon any President, and I hope therefore that the amendment will be voted down. I call for a vote.

Mr. BENNET. I want to ask, Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent for one moment, to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this amendment applies only to the reserve corps, so that the gentleman's observation that the President could increase the Army at any time he wanted does not seem to me to be justified.

Mr. HAY. If you do it in one particular, you should do so in another. You should not confine your language to one particular branch of the service.

Mr. BENNET. This exact language does not appear anywhere else in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to appoint a board of five officers of the Army to investigate and report to him the feasibility and practicability of the Government manufacturing arms, munitions, and equipments, showing in said report the comparative prices of the arms, munitions, and equipment manufactured in Government plants, and those manufactured in private plants, the amount of money necessary to build and operate Government plants for the manufacture of arms, munitions, and equipment; showing also what the Government plants and arsenals are now doing in the way of manufacturing arms, munitions, and equipment, and what saving has accrued to the Government by reason of its having manufactured a large part of its own arms, munitions, and equipment for the last four years. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to transmit said report to Congress on or before January 1, 1917.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: "Page 48, on line 10, add a new paragraph as follows: 'SEC. 21½.'"——

Mr. HAY. The gentleman means a new section?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; a new section. I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the last word for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, Mr. Chairman, having moved to strike out the last word, and holding the floor, I will withhold my amendment for the present. I wish to say, however, that the paragraph just read is a very close approach to the entry of the Government into the business of manufacturing arms and munitions——

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, the Government has been in that business since the year 1795. That is not a very wide departure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was about to say to a greater extent than it has heretofore. [Laughter.] I do not know whether I have any real objection to the appointment of this commission for making an inquiry as to whether the Government should continue to manufacture the arms and ammunition which it needs for Government purposes, but it encourages the very long step we have recently been taking toward governmental ownership and control. However, there is a vast difference between this and other kinds of business where the Government might enter into competition with private owners. There are many reasons why the Government should make its own arms and munitions. It has been demonstrated in several instances that this sort of work has been done with great profit to the Government, and that, giving it credit for the work it has done, it has had a leveling effect upon the prices that the Government has had to pay for these things which it has had to buy from outside manufacturers.

I have in mind at least one institution where, during the last three years, approximately $2,500,000 has been saved by reason of the Government being in business for itself, manufacturing what it needs for its own purposes. A part of this saving has been due to the use of surplus material and to the working over of scrap. Now, that is as far as I care to speak upon the subject of this present section.

The amendment that I have offered, which will be read in due course, pertains to the possible use by foreign or revolutionary forces of the munitions of the Government of the United States after they have been discarded or condemned. By the amendment that has been sent to the Clerk's desk, and which will shortly be read, I propose to raise the question whether condemned arms of the Government of the United States, surplus materials made in the arsenals of the Government of the United States, or arms and ammunition bought from private sources for the United States Government, and discarded, shall be sold, so that ultimately they fall into the hands of the enemies of the Government, to be turned upon the Army of the United States. When the time comes I shall ask for careful consideration of the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am a believer in our Government arsenals. In addition to the saving which they have effected on their output, they have also kept down the price of munitions of war when we buy. I am afraid that this provision in the bill will prevent any extension of Government manufacture in Government arsenals. It calls for practically the same information, and only the information, which we already have. It calls for comparative cost of arms and ammunition and equipment manufactured in Government plants and in private plants. In the hearings on the fortification bill for 1916 Gen. Crozier put in several pages giving comparative costs of the various classes of arms and ammunition purchased and manufactured. The commission will secure no different information. Again this year, and for several years, the hearings before that committee have contained detailed information not only as to comparative prices, but also a showing with regard to what the arsenals are doing at the present time.

This section would enact into permanent law a provision calling for information that we already have, with the exception of an investigation and report as to fensibility and practicability of Government manufacture. We have that information. We have it all. We have it from the very officer who will, no doubt, be chairman of this commission, Gen. Crozier. He has always taken the position that the Government should manufacture only a small portion of what we need; that it should not engage in the general manufacture of ammunition; that it was not good policy, because the giving of orders to private manufacturers would create in this country ammunition plants to which the Government could turn in time of war.

So I say there is not a thing in this section by which we will be able to get any information that is not already available. For instance, take the provision as to what the Government arsenals are doing in the way of manufacturing arms and ammunition. Who knows what the Government arsenals are doing? Why, Gen. Crozier, the Chief of Ordnance. It is his business to know, and if there is a Government officer who does actually know what is being done in his department it is Gen. Crozier, and all that would have been necessary to obtain that information would have been to ask Gen. Crozier when he was before the committee. What are the arsenals doing at present in the way of producing arms and ammunition? What is the comparative cost? The information would have been forthcoming instantly. The subcommittee in charge of the fortifications bill has done this, and every bit of the information sought by this provision is already to be had in the hearings before that committee. I am sure the result of this provision will be to put to sleep the proposition of Government manufacture of ammunition in a larger way. It may also defeat the provision which has been written in the appropriation bills recently that 90 per cent of the appropriations for ammunition shall be used in the arsenals.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all afraid that the passage of this section will curtail Government manufacture at our arsenals. On the contrary, I believe that it will lead to more manufacturing being done in our arsenals. My colleague [Mr. GOOD] says that we already have the information. I question whether there is any Member of this House who can stand up and defend the present deplorable condition of this country in regard to our lack of matériel and appliances for making war. I will not take up very much of your time, but I want to read to you a few things which occurred in our committee. Since I came to Congress I have been asking questions with reference to Government manufacture, and I will confess to you that the more I ask the less I learn. [Laughter.]

On page 493 of the hearings Gen. Crozier says that—

The Government has two small-arm factories. The larger one is at Springfield Armory, in Massachusetts, and the smaller one is at the Rock Island Arsenal, in Illinois. The capacity of the Springfield Arsenal is about 500 rifles per day of eight hours.

Notice those figures. The capacity of the Rock Island Arsenal is about half that, and then he goes on to carry it out per year. I call your attention that in the same hearing Gen. Leonard Wood, whom we asked the same thing—and we have his statement in answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE]—Gen. Wood says in order to make a soldier in six months out of the average intelligent material we would have to have the officers first. Whoever told you that we could prepare equipment for 700,000 men in six months was greatly mistaken. Here we have been at it a year and a half, and we are only able to produce 3,400 rifles per day. Notice the comparative figures between Gen. Wood, at the head of the Army, and the Chief of Ordnance, and then stand up and tell me that you know. You do not know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Gen. Crozier has charge of the manufacturing establishment of the Army and not only knows the needs and capacity of those arsenals but he has run them to their capacity. The figures that Gen. Wood gave of 3,000 rifles a day is not inconsistent with Gen Crozier's statement of 750 rifles a day. Gen. Crozier was speaking of the capacity of the two Government plants, on eight-hour shifts, while Gen. Wood may have been speaking of the capacity of all the plants—Government and private—to turn out rifles.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I was going to call attention to the fact that Gen. Wood does not mean the arsenals alone.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not only that, but the Committee on Appropriations during the present session has gone quite extensively into the question of the capacity of the Government manufacturing establishments, and, without attempting to prophesy as to what the committee will do, I can say that for myself, from information furnished the committee, I believe that by a reasonable expenditure on certain arsenals the Government capacity can be largely increased at a profit to the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The only objection, I might add, that I would have to the provision is that my experience has been that the Army officer, as a general rule, believes that the private manufacturer should be encouraged regardless of cost, and he is not in favor of the manufacture by the Government on a scale that many of us have believed was desirable. For instance, I believe the statement was made that by an expenditure of $750,000 an enlargement of the powder establishment of the Army could be effected that in the next four years, upon the basis of this year's estimate for powder, would result in saving the Government about $4,000,000. I am in favor of putting that much money into additional facilities.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question, and that is if the report of the board is adverse to the Government manufacture, as unquestionably it will be, if that will not stop to a large extent the Government manufacture?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Speaking for myself, I am not afraid of the report of the Army board. They will tell the truth or we will know that they have not done so. Your Military Committee has been holding sessions for a long time, and I call attention to the fact that it has been able to tell when men were telling the truth and when they were trying to shade their opinions to suit the prejudice of some other person.

I want to call attention to the fact that in this country to-day you have plenty of men for war. You have not enough equipment to furnish them to go to war with. You have not machine guns. You have in your arsenals factories equipped to turn out machine guns. You have not rifles enough to equip an army of 300,000 men.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken; we have enough to fit out a million men on hand to-day.

Mr. ANTHONY. Possibly the gentleman from Iowa forgets that we have a million high-power rifles in reserve.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. And I call attention to the fact that 400,000 of those rifles are antiquated rifles—Krags. You have not but 700,000, or they think they have 700,000; but you are practically provided for an Army of 200,000 Regulars and something like 200,000 militiamen, and you have only about 700,000 rifles to-day. You all understand that these rifles go out of use very fast when they are once put in action. Now, the trouble is that we do not know, and no one seems to know, what is the trouble. We ought to be manufacturing rifles at these arsenals. You have had in this country for the last two years standing idle the most modern up-to-date factories for the manufacture of Springfield rifles, and yet to-day they are standing idle, and if war broke out to-morrow this thing would be brought home to you.

Mr. HAY. Did the gentleman from Iowa offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Only a pro forma amendment, and that is withdrawn. Now, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] offers an amendment as a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 48, after line 10, insert a new section:

"SEC. 21a. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to prepare or cause to be prepared, or to purchase or otherwise procure, such gauges, dies, jigs, tools, fixtures, and other special aids and appliances, including specifications and detailed drawings, as may be necessary for the immediate manufacture of arms, ammunition, and special equipment necessary to arm and equip the land forces of the United States in time of war: Provided, That in the expenditure of any sums appropriated to carry out the purposes of this section the existing laws prescribing competition in the procurement of supplies by purchase shall not govern, whenever in the opinion of the Secretary of War such action will be for the best interest of the public service."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The bill is not a bill to provide for the manufacture or procurement of arms and munitions of war. It deals entirely with the organization, raising, and equipment of men. This is authority to acquire munitions of war. It is not germane to this bill.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill is entitled "A bill to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States." The paragraph which we have just passed, paragraph 21, deals with the matter of the manufacture of ammunition, and if this is not an amendment to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, I do not know what it is. It seems to me that when we are dealing simply with the arming, equipping, and furnishing ammunition for the land forces of the United States, over which the Committee on Military Affairs has jurisdiction in this House, certainly I am offering a germane amendment when I offer one which will materially aid in the arming and equipping of those forces as this amendment surely will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph just read merely calls for information as to the capacity of the Government to do certain things. This amendment gives it authority not at all in connection with the purposes of the bill. The object of the bill must be taken not only from its title but from the provisions of the bill. There is nothing in the bill for the manufacture or procurement or acquisition of munitions, arms, and equipment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Connecticut if he has noticed in that regard that in section 47, page 59, there is express provision that the Secretary of War can procure by purchase and manufacture and issue arms and ammunition and equipment.

Mr. TILSON. Certainly that is in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct the attention of the Chair to section 82 which provides for the utilization of atmospheric nitrogen so as to provide an adequate supply of nitric acid for the ultimate manufacture of powder. The bill does more than provide for the personnel of the Army. If the bill in any provision relates to the manufacture of ammunition, naturally a proposition on the same line would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. If this proposition be not in order on this bill, upon what bill would it be in order?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know what bill it would be in order upon.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Committee on Military Affairs has jurisdiction of this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that this bill, which is entitled "A bill to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States," carries many matters besides the mere matter of personnel, and the subject matter of the amendment which is proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut being a matter which is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Chair is unable to see why it is not germane. Will the gentleman from New York permit the Chair to ask him this question, Suppose this were brought in as an integral part of the bill, would a point of order then lie against it in the opinion of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It makes a difference, the Chair will understand, whether the bill has provisions in it or whether they are proposed to it as to whether a matter is germane.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would call the attention of the Chair to the fact also that the jurisdiction is conferred on the Committee on Military Affairs not only with respect to the Military Establishment, but with respect to anything pertaining to the public defense under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands. The Chair thinks this matter is germane to this bill, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] how much time he desires?

Mr. TILSON. I had intended to ask that I might proceed for 10 minutes, but it is very late, and perhaps with the ocular demonstration that I can make with my exhibits here I can get through in 5 minutes.

Mr. HAY. Then, I will ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. I will state that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has an amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I shall object.

Mr. HAY. How much time do gentlemen on that side want?

Mr. GOOD. I want five minutes.

Mr. HAY. How much time does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire?

Mr. GARDNER. Every moment of time I might get I would rather give to the gentleman from Connecticut. If he takes 15 minutes, that is the least he ought to take.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I want to preserve the status of an amendment I have pending.

Mr. HAY. I do not see that this has anything to do with the status of an amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. Will it be in order to offer an amendment that the Government shall establish and maintain plants for the manufacture of all arms, munitions, and equipment required for the purpose of maintaining the Military Establishment of the United States?

The CHAIRMAN. That might be in order, but not at this time.

Mr. LONDON. Not at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at this time.

Mr. LONDON. When can such an amendment be offered?

The CHAIRMAN. After this amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. LONDON. I thank the Chair.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a new section, and I do not know whether the motion of the gentleman from Virginia will preclude me from offering that or not.

The CHAIRMAN. No; it will not.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto end in 20 minutes. That gives 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota, and 10 to the gentleman from Connecticut.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto shall close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Virginia be willing to allow the gentleman from Connecticut to have 15 minutes? This is a very interesting matter.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman said he did not want but 5 minutes and I agreed to give him 10.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman came up the aisle and said he would like to have more time, and I think——

Mr. HAY. I think everybody is in favor of the amendment; nobody opposes it, and I do not see what is the use of taking a whole lot of time over something of which everybody is in favor.

Mr. BENNET. If everybody is in favor, why not vote?

Mr. HAY. Very well, let us do that.

Mr. TILSON. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment the following:

"The Secretary of War shall also make, or cause to be made, a complete list of all privately owned plants in the United States equipped to manufacture arms or ammunition, or the component parts thereof. He shall obtain full and complete information regarding the kind of arms or ammunition, or the component parts thereof, manufactured, or that can be manufactured by each such plant, the equipment in each plant, and the maximum capacity thereof. He shall also prepare, or cause to be prepared, a list of privately owned manufacturing plants in the United States capable of being readily transformed into ammunition factories, where the capacity of the plant is sufficient to warrant transforming such plant or plants into ammunition factories in time of war or when war is imminent; and as to all such plants the Secretary of War shall obtain full and complete information as to the equipment of each such plant, and he shall prepare comprehensive plans for transforming each such plant into an ammunition factory, or a factory in which to manufacture such parts of ammunition as in the opinion of the Secretary of War such plant is best adapted."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment as a new section, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 48, after line 10, add new paragraph, as follows:

"SEC. 20b. That all arms or war munitions of any kind condemned as obsolete or unfit for service by the United States, and not in use by military organizations or training schools in the United States, shall be broken up in the arsenals, or as the Secretary of War may direct, to the end that no such condemned or obsolete arms or munitions of war shall pass by sale or otherwise into the hands of foreign Governments or the revolutionary forces thereof, or of outlaws within or beyond the borders of the United States."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that. I do not think that can possibly have anything to do with the Military Establishment or the public defense.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish the gentleman would reserve his point of order.

Mr. HAY. I reserve it for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment for the purpose of raising the moral question which it involves. For a number of years it has been the custom of the War Department to dispose of its condemned arms and munitions by sale. I recall a number of efforts that have been made during the pendency of military affairs bills to have some such provision as this inserted, the purpose of which, of course, is plain. The thought conveyed by this amendment is that whereas it may be entirely proper for the United States to remove from its arsenals arms for which it has no use, it may not be entirely proper for it to dispose of these discarded arms so that they may pass into the hands of an enemy country to be used against the soldiers of the United States.

It will be recalled that when the present trouble in Mexico broke out there was much discussion over the shipment of arms from the United States into Mexico. And it is pretty thoroughly understood that the continuance of the revolutionary troubles that have prevailed in Mexico has been due to the fact that the arms have been supplied from the United States.

The President at one time put an embargo upon the shipment of arms into Mexico, and then at another time changed his mind and raised that embargo. Now we are chasing bandits in Mexico, and it would seem to be a travesty upon legislation in the United States if we did not or could not stop the practice of passing United States arms over to them. We certainly should not hand them guns to use against the Army of the United States.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. You do not claim that the Government of the United States has been selling arms in Mexico or anywhere else since this war started?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I mean to say that the Government of the United States has been in the habit of selling its old arms; that in times past they have been bought by speculators in arms; and that in turn they have gotten into the hands of revolutionists in Mexico, and, at other times, into the hands of the revolutionists in other South American countries. Such arms in the past have been an inspiration there for the people to rise up against their Governments, and, in the matter of their differences with the United States, to protect themselves against the soldiery of the United States. I do not think it is a good thing for the Government of the United to be engaged in——

Mr. GORDON. It never has been engaged in it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (continuing). To permit arms they have no further use for to be sold to bandits in Mexico and used by those bandits to protect themselves from the soldiers of this country.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is making a forcible statement, but I wanted to ask him if he voted for the sale of the battleships Idaho and Mississippi?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did, because of the very earnest importunity of the gentlemen upon the other side who needed that battleship money to restore the Treasury of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does your amendment contemplate in any way preventing the sale of individual pieces of discarded arms to individuals for target practice?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not if they are in the hands of training schools or other associations under the direction of the Secretary of War. But if there is no further use for them on the part of the War Department, and they are not loaned to schools or other associations, they should not be sold so that they would fall into the hands of revolutionists; they should be broken up. I have just indicated that, partly by using the scrap that has come from the use of discarded material, there has been saved in three years in one of the arsenals in this country a large part of a total saving of $2,500,000. And why, if we can use the scrap ourselves, should we sell it, to fall into the hands of Villa, or any other revolutionist or trouble maker who attacks the United States?

I do not want to take up any more time, Mr. Chairman, the matter has been explained, so far as I am concerned. I hope the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] will not insist upon his point of order, because it seems to me fair that some such limitation as this should go into the Army bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia insist on his point of order?

Mr. HAY. Yes; I insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 21. I was on my feet trying to get recognition when the new section was taken up. I understand I can not get recognition to offer my amendment now unless I get unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to return to section 21 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. HAY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, what is the gentleman's request?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment, that the board be composed of two Army officers and three civilians instead of five Army officers. The board will be appointed under my amendment, as it is in the bill, by the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman will make it "three Army officers and two civilians," I will not object.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I accept the gentleman's suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request to return to the section?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Minnesota: On page 47, line 20, after the word "five," insert the words "citizens, two of whom shall be civilians and three of whom shall be," so that the line as amended shall read:

"SEC. 21. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to appoint a board of five citizens, two of whom shall be civilians and three of whom shall be officers of the Army," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentlemann from Minnesota.

Mr. HAY. I accept the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That the militia of the United States shall consist of all able-bodied male citizens of the United States and of all other able-bodied males who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States who are not less than 18 years of age and not more than 45 years of age; and the militia shall be divided into two classes, to wit, the National Guard and the unorganized militia.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, when section 23 is read I want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word. Section 23 has not yet been reached.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] indicate whether throughout this bill provision is made that those who enlist in the service of the Army of the United States shall be citizens. This paragraph raises that question.

Mr. HAY. I did not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to know if any other than a citizen of the United States can enlist in the Army of the United States?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Those who are not citizens can enlist in the Army of the United States?

Mr. HAY. They must either be citizens or must be men who have declared their purpose to become citizens.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then a declaration of intention is sufficient to enable a man to enlist?

Mr. HAY. I understand that the declaration provided by law when a man goes into court to get his citizenship papers is required.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The matter of citizenship appears here in a number of paragraphs, but the question is raised whether a man who is neither a citizen nor has declared his intention to be a citizen is qualified to enlist in the Army of the United States.

Mr. HAY. He must have declared his intention to become a citizen.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He must have declared his intent and have promised to abide by and serve under the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. That the National Guard shall consist of the regularly commissioned and enlisted militia between the ages of 18 and 64 years—

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will wait until the Clerk concludes the reading of the section.

Mr. MANN. I understood we were to quit as soon as we got through the National Guard.

Mr. HAY. When the Clerk concludes the reading of this section we will do so. I will then move to rise. Only a line or two remain to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. That the National Guard shall consist of the regularly commissioned and enlisted militia between the ages of 18 and 64 years, organized, armed, and equipped as hereinafter provided.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to this section.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. The gentleman from Ohio can offer his amendment to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BRITT, from Wednesday, March 22, to Saturday, March 25, on account of important business.

To Mr. EDWARDS, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. CAREW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reference of H. R. 1434 be changed from the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the Committee on Pensions. I have spoken to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], and he has no objection whatever.

The SPEAKER. That is a private bill, and the chairman of the committee can change the reference.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the McLemore resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I make the same request.

Mr. FIELDS. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL], the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH], and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] ask leave to extend remarks on the McLemore resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 65.
